Introduction

An estimated eight thousand eye witness reports of unidentified flying objects, extraterrestrial encounters and cryptid sightings are recorded every year across the world. Private UFO research organizations believe that a more accurate number of cases, including unreported estimates, put sightings of unidentified aerial craft at a mind-boggling eighty thousand encounters experienced annually, with the number growing every single year since the early 1900's.

It is easy to dismiss the vast majority of many of these supposed extraterrestrial sightings as nothing more than misidentifications of common aircraft, meteor strikes, atmospheric looming/lensing phenomena and a plethora of other common aerial occurrences, allowing skeptics various avenues of practical explanations and tactics of denial. However, far more peculiar and evident cases of extraterrestrial contact appear to make up a tiny percent of UFO reports (an estimated less than .01%) that make such skeptic claims impossible to accept.

According to a series of reports referred to as "Close Encounters of the Fourth Kind", thousands of individuals from around the world are believed to have made direct contact with extraterrestrial life in one of the most terrifying ways possible, through forcible abduction and torturous experimentation. In this book, you will find a collection of such Alien Abduction reports made by reliable witness sightings that feature impossible to explain encounters far too bizarre to ignore. Ranging from first person accounts of alien hybrid experimentation to bizarre military disappearances of pilots suddenly vanishing while inside the cockpit of moving aircraft, alien abductions have been reported in a variety of forms and agendas.

Alien Abduction Description & Theory

Many consistent factors among Alien Abduction reports often describe symptoms that can be easily dismissed by the victims without giving the situation a second's thought, though point towards evidence of alien abduction. Symptoms include the sudden loss of time, unexplainable bruises, the sudden appearance of scars or surgical marks, reported night terrors, sudden attacks of anxiety and the sudden unexplainable urge to go for a drive or walk outside in the middle of the night.

Of the Alien Abduction victims that have vivid memories of their experiences, consistent descriptions of surgical tables, tentacle-like machinery, long thin needles, flashing lights and telepathic communication, seem to be common themes amongst nearly 90% of abduction reports. Odd enough, physical descriptions of the supposed extraterrestrial entities responsible for abduction reports are not consistent across nearly all alien abduction reports, with descriptions ranging from short grey-alien like creatures, to tall mantis like humanoids, to lizard-like reptilians and to finally blonde-haired blue-eyed nordic-like beings having been the culprits behind the abduction and experimentation experience.

Unfortunately, not all alien abduction reports end with the victim being returned to their last known location, often instead leading to mysterious disappearances or horrifying mutilations. The only evidence of such reports having been the work of supposed extraterrestrial intelligence coming from supplementary witness testimony, gathered physical evidence of UFO involvement or statements of repeated abductions made by the victim prior to their disappearance or death.

SIGHTINGS

The Disappearance Of Evelyn Rauch

On the 15th of July, back in 1934, a strange missing persons report would come out of the small town of Rocky Mountain House, located out in Alberta Canada, that would leave father John Rauch and his friends under investigation from the local Royal Canadian Mounted Police for the disappearance of a young two year old girl by the name of Evelyn Rauch. According to the official missing person's report, John Rauch claims that he was on his farm, walking around his property and tending to his livestock and fields alongside his young two year old daughter, Evelyn Rauch, when she suddenly disappeared.

Additionally, John Rauch would explain at a later time that it was fairly routine for the young toddler to join him while he tended to the chores of the property and that it was not unusual for Evelyn to have been around the livestock as she had already grown used to the animals. As John Rauch was tending to the cows, he had left Evelyn outside next to his barn and told his daughter to stay at the location or to explore inside the barn if she wished. As John was out in the pasture, it was at around 9:00 AM that he would return to the barn to find that Evelyn was no longer standing near the structure. Believing that she had gone into the barn and was possibly hiding, John continued searching for her on his own for about an hour before he contacted some neighbours and friends who were known for serving as helping hands on the farm to help look for Evelyn.

After spending the entire day looking for her, John and his friends were unable to find any sign of Evelyn and started to worry that she had possibly wandered off of the property within the few minutes that John had spent tending to the cows out in the pasture. Due to the fact that John's farm was roughly twelve miles outside of the small town of Rocky Mountain House, he immediately began to worry that perhaps Evelyn was lost within the nearby wilderness. The wilderness surrounding the Rauch farm was known by the locals as being an incredibly wet region, with many surrounding lakes, creeks and rivers throughout the area that could make it incredibly dangerous for young Evelyn Rauch if she happened to wander into the nearby marshland. Oddly enough, it was not until late in the evening that John decided to contact the local Royal Canadian Mountain Police and begin an official search and rescue of his daughter more than six hours after her initial disappearance.

Given the fact that it had already been more than six hours since her disappearance, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police immediately began their search for Evelyn and conducted an official missing persons investigation with suspicions targeted towards the father and their friends. Due to John Rauch's strange delay in contacting the local authorities and waiting until night time to begin the official search, it seemed that Evelyn's father was at the centre of the investigation. Fearing that the father and friends could possibly hamper efforts to find the daughter, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police immediately took charge of the search and pulled as many resources together to locate any evidence of Evelyn's whereabouts.

By the sixteenth of July, the following day after Evelyn's disappearance, more than one hundred and fifty local volunteers would join the search efforts for Evelyn Rauch conducted by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. With the search beginning at first daybreak, the teams covered the entire farm, the surrounding areas, the local sloughs, rivers, creeks and nearby pastures as well as a two mile radius surrounding the Rauch farm. Given the fact that the surrounding wilderness appeared to have been caked with thick mud and low lying waters, it became imperative that the volunteers slowed down and poked down into the nearby waters to make sure that Evelyn's body had not been swallowed up by the elements.

By the seventeenth of July, roughly forty eight hours following the disappearance of Evelyn Rauch, more than a thousand volunteers from the surrounding area joined in on the search for the missing two year old, with volunteers and Royal Canadian Mounted Police from nearby cities deciding to join in on the search. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police would later describe the number of individuals joined in on the search as a small standing army, with groups of people covering every square foot of John's farm in the morning before the search began.

It was at around this time that the investigation into Evelyn's father, John Rauch, started to take a strange turn. According to John Rauch, he had only been away from Evelyn for a few minutes, keeping her within sight as he worked with his cows in the pasture. As he turned away, however, within the span of a few minutes, she appeared to have disappeared and been out of sight of John's gaze. Although John had merely assumed she went into the barn, it seemed that the timing for Evelyn's disappearance was a tiny window too small for a young two year old girl to have used to have disappeared from the property. Suspicions of a possible abduction now became a reality for the investigation.

Luckily for the Rauch family, at around 11:00 in the morning, on the seventeenth of July, an estimated fifty hours after Evelyn's Rauch's disappearance, volunteer search and rescue found Evelyn as they were travelling through a wet and camp muddy bank located near a local slough. An article from the Calgary Herald would describe the event in the published july 17th paper with the following paragraph:

"Standing in tall grass beside a slough about a mile and a half from her home, she was crying bitterly when she was found by Joe Bertagnolli, a farmer who was one of the search party. She was hurried home and found to be suffering no ill effects except exhaustion and was put to bed. She was unable to explain where she had been and how she had lived through two hot days and two cold nights since she vanished early Sunday."

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police would later provide additional statements on the recovery of the young girl that appeared to have severely doubted the normalcy of Evelyn Rauch's Disappearance. One of the most strange facets of her recovery was the fact that Evelyn appeared to have been found because she had been "crying bitterly" as if she had only just started crying as the discoverer Joe Bertagnolli was within earshot. Typically, it is highly unusual for a child to still have the ability to cry loudly and bitterly after two days of disappearing as by that point in time, the voice would have gone hoarse from crying or the child would not have had enough energy to have let out a cry. Given the fact that Evelyn had been missing for two days without food or water, it was difficult to explain her ability to cry and her energy at being recovered.

Additionally, despite the extreme cold and the fact that she was found wet, Evelyn appeared to have been in great condition with no evidence of hypothermia or frostbite. She appeared to have had no issues with hunger or dehydration and was remarked as having returned home to sleep with a full recovery. When asked where she was or how she had disappeared, Evelyn claimed that she could not remember and believed that she had merely woken up out in the slough shortly before Joe Bertagnolli had found her.

The last aspect of Evelyn's recovery that search and rescue volunteers found unusual was the fact that Evelyn had been discovered within a mile and a half of the property, in an area that had already been searched several times by several different groups of volunteers Given the fact the Evelyn was so close to the property, it seemed incredibly difficult to explain why she would not have responded to people calling out to her or to have been within earshot of those passing by the area. According to the details of the official report, it was almost as if Evelyn had disappeared and then reappeared two days into the future in a nearby area, with no time for her having passed in the interim.

Albert Lancaster Abduction 1942

During the month of September, back in 1942, while working as a security guard at the Newbiggin-on-Sea, Northumbria radar site, a man by the name of Albert Lancaster made a report claiming that he had been abducted by extraterrestrial life while on the job. According to Albert Lancaster, while on his shift, he remarked that he had a sudden and intense urge to go outside and stare up at the sky. Although he tried to fight the urge for several minutes, believing it could potentially cost him his job to take a break from his position, the impulse continued to grow until it completely consumed his mind and forced him to leave his position.

As Mr. Lancaster exited the building, he remarked that he saw a large sphere-shaped light that was completely surrounded by a morphing dark mist that seemed to move around the body of the craft. Believing that the craft was a possible weapon created by the German army, he ran to sound the alarm and alert his colleagues. Unfortunately, before he could take more than a few steps, he was struck by a beam of light, emitted from the dark mist surrounding the craft, that created a floating sensation throughout his entire body. His last memory of the encounter was that of slowly lifting into the air before he awoke back at his position before the end of his shift. For some unknown reason, following the encounter, Albert Lancaster claimed to have possessed psychic powers for a period of time following the abduction event before they disappeared completely.

The Discrepancy Of Tommy Jenkins

Back on the 4th of May, during the year 1950, a young two year old boy by the name of Tommy Jenkins would suddenly vanish for a period of forty eight hours outside of a united states military base located in the state of washington but would just as suddenly return seemingly unaffected by both time and weather and was completely unaware that several days had passed.

According to the missing persons case, a young boy who was either two or three years old, by the name of Tommy Jenkins, was living with his family who had been stationed within the United States Military base known as Fort Lewis that rests roughly two miles southwest of Tacoma, Washington. Given the fact that Fort Lewis housed over six thousand soldiers of various rank, Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins felt comfortable allowing their son to play outside unattended throughout the surrounding area.

Unfortunately for Tommy, while stationed at Fort Lewis, Tommy often complained of feeling lonely and wanting a friend to play with but was unable to find any other children his age living at the base. Aware that Tommy was often lonely and needing someone to watch his dog, a fellow resident of Fort Lewis, who lived next to the Jenkins family within the non-commissioned housing area, would often let Tommy play with his dog, an Irish Setter breed, named lassie. According to Jenkin's parents, Tommy had played with Lassie many times before and the dog was always very playful and friendly and had never hurt Tommy in the past.

Oddly enough, on the fourth of May, sometime around 12:00 PM, Tommy was outside his house playing with the neighbor's dog when he suddenly vanished from the premises. When Tommy's parents went outside to look for him, they were unable to find any sign of Tommy or the dog. Believing that perhaps Tommy was at the neighbors house, they asked the neighbor if he had seen Tommy or Lassie and the neighbor would reply that he had left the dog with Tommy and neither had yet returned. After asking other soldiers passing by the area if they had seen their son and a dog, one of the soldiers would remark that while he was out by the lake, he had seen a young boy and a dog that fit the description of Tommy and Lassie playing out near an open gravel pit.

Given the fact that the housing units that the Jenkin family were at was located less than 1500 feet away from American Lake, it was no surprise to the parents that Tommy had decided to walk over to the lake and play near the beach. Believing that perhaps Tommy would be back by dinner time, the parents decided to wait for Tommy to return home before panicking any further. Sadly, by the time that dinner would roll around, Tommy was still nowhere to be seen. It would be at this moment that the parent's would contact the local authorities and a search and rescue operation was initiated.

Due to the fact that the region bordering American Lake is an open untamed wilderness region, the commander of Fort Lewis organized the largest search and rescue operation ever recorded within the state of washington, pulling every available soldier at all hours of the day and night to search for Tommy Jenkins. Reportedly, over six thousand men and women organized a search and rescue grid that would cover every inch of the military base and immediate surrounding area looking for the boy, including several miles surrounding the Lake and nearby wilderness regions. Within several hours of the reported disappearance, the Commander would ask for helicopters and planes to begin aerial search and rescue, making use of advanced infrared thermal technologies, while a team of highly trained bloodhounds were tasked with picking up Tommy's scent using his clothes.

Although it defies explanation, not a sign of Tommy or Lassie was located. When the bloodhounds would pick up Tommy's scent and scour through the nearby gravel pit, the dogs would act as if Tommy had walked through the gravel pit and suddenly vanished from thin air, unable to follow his scent any further. Though some of the search and rescue volunteers began to theorize that perhaps the young boy had fallen into the lake and drowned, the neighbor would often argue that his dog Lassie would not have drowned as she was a great swimmer and would have returned home by nightfall.

After over forty eight hours, with temperatures in the night dropping as low as forty degrees fahrenheit and with light rainfall throughout the area, search and rescue volunteers and the Fort Lewis Commander started shifting the priority of the mission into a body recovery, believing that it would have been impossible for a three year old boy to have survived the first night in the rain, let alone two consecutive nights of rain and freezing temperatures. Yet, on the fourth day of searching, an impossible to explain discovery was made.

According to a group of soldiers, they had been searching around the lake when they claimed to have heard the sound of a boy shouting and laughing in the distance. Believing that Tommy was nearby, they cut their way through heavy brush and would discover Tommy and Lassie playing on the side of the beach of American Lake, alive and completely well. Tommy's clothes were remarked to have been dry and in perfect condition, the dog was described as being happy, energetic and playful and Tommy was talkative and full of energy. Unable to explain the condition of the boy and dog after almost four days of freezing cold temperatures without food or water and light rainfall, authorities of Fort Lewis immediately theorized that Tommy must have been abducted and returned to the beach once the investigation was developing, believing that one of the soldiers within the military base as secretly hiding Tommy during the four days of searching.

on the eighth of Mary, 1950, an article published in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, the Tacoma local newspaper outlet, would write the following about the incident:

"Major Artie N. Heape, Fort Lewis provost marshal, said Saturday that three-year-old Tommy Jenkins, who has been missing two days, has been found alive and well. He apparently had been kidnapped, Major Heape said, and returned to the point which he was picked up. 'No three year-old boy could have survived two. nights in the open with weather as we have had in the last 48 hours,' said Major Heape."

Hoping to discover the perpetrator behind the incident, Sgt. William Jenkins, Tommy's father, and the authorities of Fort Lewis, questioned Tommy for several answers but were unable to get any answers surrounding his strange disappearance. According to Tommy, he had been unaware that any time had passed between his disappearance and his recovery, still believing that it was the fourth of May, sometime around mid afternoon. Tommy would explain that he remembered waking up in an area where there were no homes and was found shortly after but was unable to remember anything other than walking to the beach, playing for a couple hours, waking up with Lassie who had also been sleeping and playing at the beach for another hour before he had been found. Even more peculiar, the area Tommy had been found was a region previously searched several times by the soldiers of Fort Lewis.

Given the fact that aerial vehicles were equipped with thermal technologies, it had been assumed that Tommy and the Dog had fallen into a body of water, blocking any infrared detection, however, Tommy and Lassie had been perfectly dry and should have been found within a few hours of their disappearance.

The Strange Recovery of Gunnar Peterson

Unlike typical disappearance cases, the disappearance of Gunnar Peterson would also feature a heartfelt recovery with Gunnar appearing to have been in perfect health at the time of his recovery. His account for exactly what caused his disappearance is a matter even more difficult to explain, however, and is often remarked as one of the first true Alien Abduction cases dating as far back as the early 1950's. According to the Gunnar Peterson report, back on the 6th of August, during the year 1950, Mr. Peterson had traveled to the Colville National Forest located in the state of Washington only two miles south of the Canadian Border with his entire family, to engage in a nice relaxing weekend vacation of hiking up and down the Churchill Mountain. Once at the National Forest, it became apparent to the family that the native wild grown huckleberries were in season and ripe for picking. This sudden realization led the family to planning their day around picking huckleberries together on the side of Churchill Mountain and spending the rest of the day having a picnic at the summit.

Unfortunately for the Peterson family, as the group were picking huckleberries near the top of the mountain in open areas well within line of sight of each other, the family suddenly noticed that the father and husband, Gunnar Peterson, was no longer within sight of the family. Wondering where he had gone off to, Gunnar's daughter, Mrs. W.A. Graves, had called out to her father several times but got no response. At first the family was not worried about his temporary absence, believing that perhaps he had decided to use the restroom nearby or ventured into a more secluded area where he would no longer be within earshot of the group. As the day stretched on, however, the family grew increasingly worried as every member continued searching and calling out to Gunnar but getting no response.

After seeing no sign of Gunnar for over three hours, the family would immediately call the local Steven County Sheriff department and report sixty five year old Gunnar as missing. Within only a few hours of being alerted, Sheriff Beryl Warren would bring together several dozen search and rescue volunteers made up of local residents, fellow law enforcement officers, the national park forest service personnel and several dozen soldiers from the local military base.

The first night, the search and rescue volunteers focused on combing through the area where he had last been seen with the family, following any trails and areas that connected with wild huckleberry bushes that the father could have ventured off into. Despite looking through every open huckleberry bush, however, no sign of Gunnar. After the first two days of searching, law enforcement and search and rescue volunteers were growing increasingly desperate due to the sudden drop in temperature in the area and the light rain. Given the fact that the mountain stands at a height of almost 4800 feet in elevation and is filled with layers of lush thick forest and hundreds of small running bodies of water, search and rescue teams were growing increasingly concerned with the possibility of finding Gunnar Peterson alive as they believed that the terrain would have made it incredibly difficult for Mr. Peterson to have safely made his way down the mountain while lost and alone.

By the third day of Gunnar Peterson's disappearance, a specialized canine search and rescue team was employed in the search that had come from Idaho and eastern Washington. After the family supplied the dogs with clothes and shoes that Gunnar Peterson had worn, the dogs had followed the scent into the middle of a huckleberry bush path where Mr. Peterson had last been seen by his family. Oddly enough, the sheriff would remark that the canines seem confused as to where the trail continued and were unable to maintain Gunnar's scent for long before losing it entirely.

After seven days of looking for Mr. Peterson, search and rescue volunteers started to give up hope on finding Mr. Peterson alive, causing the search efforts to slowly taper off as law enforcement, military personnel and forest servicemen had the primary goal of finding a body and no longer a living person. The search for Mr. Peterson would continue for another three days until Gunnar's Daughter and her husband would find Gunnar more than five miles away from where he had last been seen.

According to Gunnar Peterson's daughter, she and her husband continued searching for her father in a circling radius that would lead them more than five miles away from the base of Churchill Mountain. As they were in the area, they started to notice a collection of abandoned houses and shacks seemingly constructed in the middle of nowhere. According to locals in the region, the houses had been constructed many years ago and were at the center of what was referred to as "high strangeness" with many of the locals too scared or superstitious to venture into the areas. As they searched through the abandoned shacks, Gunnar's daughter would find Gunnar sleeping in one of the abandoned buildings seemingly in perfect health.

According to Gunnar Peterson, he had survived in the area for ten days primarily by drinking rain water and living off of huckleberries as his main source of food. Oddly enough, at the time of his recovery, Gunnar Peterson had only been aware of eight days that had passed, and had no idea that he had been missing for a little over ten days since the search began. When search and rescue volunteers and investigators questioned Gunnar Peterson as to how he appeared to have disappeared from the region, it became obvious that something far more bizarre had occurred.

Gunnar Peterson claimed, when talking to investigators, that he had been picking huckleberries with his family only a few feet away from the group when he suddenly felt a large mass strike the back of his head. He would then wake up sometime during the middle of the night, in pitch black darkness, believing that a falling limb or rock must have knocked him unconscious. Oddly enough, there were no marks or signs of damage against Mr. Peterson's head and he had been standing in an open field of bushes on the side of the highest point on the mountain where any falling debris would have been difficult to explain. Even more bizarre, however, was that Mr. Peterson counted only seven days having passed after he had awoken from his unconscious state. This led him to believe that he must have been knocked unconscious for a period of over two days as he was unable to account for two of the ten days that he had been missing, originally believing that he had been missing for only eight days.

The Abduction Prophecy Of Alfred Bender

Alfred Bender, the director of the International Flying Saucer Bureau, would eventually resign and shut down his organization following a number of strange encounters that he would later experience with a threatening creature that would fit the description of the Flatwoods Monster first encountered back in 1952. Referring to these unknown creatures as Ultraterrestrials, Alfred Bender claimed that throughout his studies of the unidentified flying object phenomenon, he would experience a personal contact encounter while in his home that would eventually manifest into one of the most terrifying experiences of his life and would spawn the famous Men In Black theories of his era.

In his book, Flying Saucers and The Three Men, Alfred Bender claimed that the sudden cause for his resignation and the subsequent shut down of the International Flying Saucer Bureau, an investigatory agency privately funded to pursue the study of flying saucers and explain their possible origin, was due to a threat made against his life from otherworldly beings referred to as the "Men In Black", non-human humanoid creatures he would personally refer to as ultraterrestrials. It had been several years after the shut down of the IFSB that Alfred Bender had offered his explanation of the situation, and so, several researchers into the unidentified flying object phenomena had erroneously believed that the sudden resignation was due in part to threatening actions made by the government. Particularly, a published book by Gray Barker, one of the highest ranking agents within the International Flying Saucer Bureau, would publish the book "They Knew Too Much About Flying Saucers" in which he would state the he and many other agents interested in researching the phenomena surrounding unidentified flying objects were directly harassed by members of the United States Government attempting to keep them silent about releasing information on the viability of extraterrestrial visitation.

Bender himself would deny these claims in his own published work and would detail his hidden personal experiences with these otherworldly creatures:

According to Bender, there had been several impossible to explain encounters that he had originally dismissed as possible stress hallucinations, such as witnessing a bright blue light hovering in his room, strange hypnotic eyes following him home at night and awkward encounters with people dressed in full black suits following him to a movie theater. But these events would pale in comparison to an event he would consider an alien abduction during the summer months of 1953.

After returning from a two day weekend vacation, Bender returned to his room and found an overwhelming smell of Sulphur inhabiting his bedroom. He covered his nose and quickly opened all of the windows in the house to air out the smell. It was around this time that he noticed that his radio had been turned on but was set on a station where no sound came in. He turned it off and then went to the kitchen to grab a snack to help him relax and lay down. When he returned to his room, however, he noticed blue lights flying around the space. Suddenly, the sight of the flashing blue lights caused him to become dizzy and he fell down onto his bed and entered a hypnotic state of half consciousness. He then noticed three figures enter his room that appeared to have been floating above the ground dressed as clergymen with Homburg style hats.

The floating men were described as having similar bright eyes as experienced frome encounters with peculiar men in black at a movie theater beforehand. Together, Bender claimed that they sent a telepathic message, however, given Bender's state of half-consciousness, he could not be certain. During this telepathic message, the three men told Bender that due to his persistence in studying the flying saucer phenomenon, they were there to watch him and intercept him to prevent him from publishing the secret of the flying saucers and that any attempts to further his studies and his organization would lead to personal injury. The three men then claimed that they would return in two days to show him the reason for why they were there visiting Earth and that for them to stay in contact, he would need a special device. At this point, the three men left behind a small piece of metal that was claimed to be able to allow Alfred Bender to call the three mysterious men at will and to communicate with them when the time was necessary.

The piece of metal that was provided to Alfred Bender is more accurately described as appearing to have been a miniature flying saucer-shaped coin. It supposedly glowed almost like a light and was impossible to make a dent in as Bender himself had attempted to use a file on it but the small coin was unable to be affected. According to later claims made by Bender, he'd be able to get in contact with the men if he held the coin in his hand, repeated the word "Kazik" and then turned on his radio to an empty channel. He then noticed one of the three men turned the radio dial on and the men suddenly disappeared.

Immediately following the encounter, Alfred Bender would place the mysterious coin in a locked box and then go to sleep. Upon waking, he would notice that the coin had disappeared and believed himself to have possibly imagined the entire event. Two days following the event, however, he would check his locked box again and find the coin having reappeared within the container.

He immediately picked up the coin and claimed to have had the thought of showing it to one of the International Flying Saucer Bureau agents to provide proof for his claims and come forward with his encounters. As he began to think of a strategy, he suddenly remarked that the coin began to glow a bright red and then immediately became so hot in his hand that he had to drop it. He then assumed that he was being warned not to tell anyone about the coin or his visitors and that the coin would use its powers to prevent itself from being used as proof in any way.

Having been two days since his last encounter and being told by the creatures that in two days they would contact each other, Alfred Bender then used the coin and repeated his relayed instructions to contact the humanoid creatures.

Shortly after making contact, though after having lied down for an indeterminate amount of time, Bender began to experience a lucid dream. In his claims, he felt a sudden coldness take over his body and his soul began to float above himself. As he was floating outside of his body for an unknown amount of time, he claimed that he could feel his body being physically moved and transported a great distance. He was then awoken to a sudden jerking feeling and found himself in a stainless steel room staring into bright lights

While sitting awake within the room for several minutes. Bender recounted that the lights within the room all turned off at the same time as a blue light became visible. This blue light was of a similar color and hue as compared to the previous blue lights he had encountered in his room across the many different experiences with the unknown humanoid creatures and the sulphuric gas. Unlike past moments, however, Alfred Bender was not overcome with migraines or a hypnotic state of high suggestibility as he continued analyzing the room around him. He remarked that the glass dome above him gave view to what looked like a night sky filled with stars. Although Bender would later claim that the night sky filled with stars was evidence of him having been aboard an alien craft and floating out in space, he would make the remark within his book that he was unsure of whether or not he was in space and believed that even if he was in an alien space craft, he was most likely still on earth. The night sky was more likely due to the fact that he contacted the unknown humanoid creatures late in the day.

While continuing to analyze the room, Alfred Bender noticed a wall panel slide open and one of the mysterious men stepped out into the room from behind the source of the blue light. As the man stepped from behind the wall panel, he began to communicate with Alfred Bender who claimed that he believed the communication to have been done telepathically as he was uncertain where the sound was coming from. The mysterious man would go on to show Alfred Bender a circular colored television screen and explain several explanations they had for the creation of the universe, explanations behind difficult to explain extraterrestrial phenomena such as Angel Hair and that they were not violent unless humanity would attempt to intercept them or prevent them from finishing their mission.

Shortly after, the speaker would suddenly disappear and the image of a creature would be seen on the television screen that appeared to be an organic version of the Flatwoods monster. The creature on the screen would then communicate with Alfred Bender claiming that it was now in its "true form". While in its true form, the creature did not reply to Alfred Bender's statements and seemed unaware of Bender making any statements which point to the possibility that the image of the creature was a recording and not a live demonstration.

The creature would then go on to theorize several future problems humanity will face, the primary being that the atmosphere of Earth's future will become thinner, the supply of natural oxygen will deplete and major environmental changes will force adaptations in the human body. The direct quote was stated as the following:

"We watched your people develop from small sea creatures into what you are today, but if your planet continues to exist without self-destruction, your people will change in appearance over the billions of years ahead. For your atmosphere will change. It will become thinner. Your supply of oxygen will diminish, and you will find it necessary to exist on whatever type of air mixture you may have at that time. This and other environmental changes will lead to necessary adaptations in body structure."

During the time that this meeting took place, evidence of global warming and the causes of man-made effects on the environment had not yet been understood. Even today, many research scientists believe that the increase in CO2 may cause warming averages across the entire world but not decrease oxygen production. With the increase of CO2, it was expected that vegetation would continue to grow in size to such a degree that we would see a hothouse earth effect similar to the prehistoric jurassic eras of our planet, causing a dramatic increase in oxygen in the atmosphere across the planet.

It has only been due to recent research however that the effects of CO2 on the ocean has caused a sudden change in the expected effects of oxygen production. According to data gathered over the past decade, the earth's planets have been absorbing the rising carbon dioxide at a dramatic rate, causing a sharp increase in the PH levels of the earth's oceans, turning the top layers of the oceans far more basic than is healthy for existing ecosystems. The less conservative estimates believe that this rise in PH will cause a mass reduction in algae and plankton within our oceans, killing off roughly 50% of the entire world's plankton and algae species .

It has been only over the past century that research scientists have realized that algae and plankton have been the key players in producing the oxygen necessary for life to thrive on the surface of our world. With a reduction of an expected 50%, we will see a gradual thinning of the atmosphere to such a degree that oxygen levels over the next 1,000 years will begin to slowly turn our home planet into a far less habitable region for most life. For anyone to have known this information prior to any known research on the effects of CO2 on the environment and as early as 1953 is both inconceivable and impossible, requiring a vast amount of survey data not yet possible for humanity to have gathered during those years.

Not only does this point towards possible evidence that Alfred Bender communicated with an extraterrestrial species that has been responsible for watching and studying our planet for a very long period of time, it could also mean that existing sightings of flying saucers and unidentified flying objects are here to study not only ourselves, but the environmental changes to our planet as a whole.

Robert Hunnicutt Sighting 1955

Back in the early spring of 1955, a young nineteen year old man by the name of Robert Hunnicutt claimed to have encountered a small humanoid creature while travelling through Clermont County. According to the eyewitness report, the event occurred sometime between March and May when Robert Hunnicut was driving down an isolated road that resides alongside the Little Miami River. At around 3:30 AM to 4:00 AM, as Hunnicutt reached the Madeira-Loveland Pike, he crossed a bridge leading across the Little Miami River into Loveland and noticed what he later described as three upright two-legged humanoid creatures standing along the side of the road huddled together in a triangular pattern, fidgeting awkwardly. Due to the high strangeness of the event, Robert Hunnicutt slowed his vehicle to a stop and looked at the creatures more closely.

According to Hunnicutt, he had stared at the creatures for approximately three whole minutes, during which time the humanoid beings made no violent movements or quick reactions to Hunnicutt's presence. At one point during the event, however, one of the creatures turned to Hunnicutt's direction and made a gesture that Hunnicutt interpreted as telling him to stay back or keep moving on. Despite this, the entire experience appeared to have been too mundane for Robert given the sight of the strange creatures that he would later describing as appearing to have been human like in their appearance except for the fact that they appeared to have had green skin, and large frog-like heads, standing at an estimated height of about three to four feet. The most dramatic part of their appearance however was that they appeared to have been completely naked, with frog-like bodies featuring large mouths, large eyes and a complete lack of hair.

Although it is uncertain how Robert Hunnicutt could accurately have gotten a smell from the creatures, he claimed that when he rolled down the window of his car he could smell what he described as almonds and fresh alfalfa emanating from the creatures. Before he left the area, he remarked that the creatures appeared to have had webbed hands and feet and were holding up what he described as a wand or chain that was giving off blue sparks that appeared similar to those fourth of july firework sparkler wands.

Unsure of what to do, and now becoming increasingly scared of the strange creatures, Robert Hunnicutt drove off and went straight to the local police station in Loveland, Ohio, and told them about what he had encountered. Believing that perhaps Hunnicutt was under the influence, they made him perform a field sobriety test, which he passed with flying colours. It was at this moment, though, that Hunnicutt learned that several hours had disappeared when questioned if he knew what time it was and realised that he was suffering from a strange sensation of time loss. Confused as to Hunnicutt's behaviour and mental state, the officers told Robert to head home and then sent officers to investigate the bridge. Although the details surrounding the bridge investigation are somewhat conflicting, it is believed that the Loveland Police department found nothing remarkable at the bridge but still decided to leave an officer to watch the bridge and the roadways through the night.

Some ufologists and cryptid experts believe that Rober Hunnicutt's sighting relates more closely with typical UFO and extraterrestrial encounters, as time loss events are very common for alien abductions. It is typically reported that when individuals are abducted by extraterrestrial beings, they will have memory gaps or blocks of the event to prevent the trauma from affecting them, and will often only remember their abduction after repeated sessions of abductions or through hypnosis memory recalls. Given the strange sparkling wand of the creatures, ufologists believe that the creatures possessed a handheld form of advanced technology more akin to our modern day smartphones. Due to the fact that this account was recorded back in the early 1950's, such technology would not have been within Hunnicutt's mind.

The next morning, a more thorough investigation was put into the report, with law enforcement performing a background check into the character of Robert Hunnicutt. After a few inquiries, it was deemed that Hunnicutt was a reliable witness as he was a member of the Loveland Civil Defence, an emergency preparedness organisation focused on prepping civilians in the event of a nuclear attack during the Cold War. Although it is impossible to confirm, it is believed that the investigation was taken over by the United States Federal Bureau of Investigation before being closed and dismissed as a false report or animal misidentification.

Loveland Frogman, Georgia Sighting

Back on the 3rd of July, during that same year in 1955, another strange Loveland Frogman sighting would take place in the state of Georgia. The oddest part of the encounter however is that though the sighting would take place a few states away, the eyewitness to the event was a resident from Loveland Ohio travelling down south to Florida. According to a report told by a Mrs. Margaret Symmonds, she and her husband were driving from Cincinnati, Ohio all the way to Florida for a vacation getaway they had planned a few months prior. At around 3:30 in the morning, while passing through Stockton, Georgia, the couple claimed to have seen a group of four small humanoid creatures huddled in the middle of the road, preventing them from driving forward and forcing them to a stop in the middle of the lane.

According to Margaret Symmonds, the four entities appeared to stand at a height of three to four feet tall and were completely grey in skin tone. The most peculiar aspect of these strange creatures, however, were that they appeared to have had frog-like appearances with one of the creatures holding what appeared to have been a glowing stick in his hand. After swerving to avoid the creatures, stopping and then immediately driving off, Margaret Symmonds noticed her husband had been asleep during the encounter and so woke him up to tell him about what she saw. Curious as to the encounter, the husband attempted to convince his wife to turn around so he could see what the creature's looked like, but Margaret was too terrified to turn back around and investigate further.

After a few more minutes, the couple then noticed that several hours had passed without them realising it, experiencing a form of unexplainable time loss after the encounter.

The Abduction of Antonio Vilas Boas 1957

Working as a farmer, back in October of 1957, Antonio Vilas Boas would go on to be one of the first reported alien abduction encounters, with not only the overwhelming evidence to prove his claims, but also as one of the main reports that helped to develop further evidence for the Alien Hybrid theory. According to his alien abduction report, on the night of October 15th, 1957, Antonio Vilas Boas and his brother were out working in their fields when they began to notice a bright red light in the night sky. Originally, they had believed the light to have been a form of aircraft, but then as time went on, assumed that given its stationary position in the sky, it was most likely a star they had never noticed before. They would finish a portion of the fields that night with no further incident.

On the night of October 16th, 1957, Antonio Vilas Boas was out working in his fields without the help of his brother, well after the sun had set once again, to avoid the scorching temperatures of the daytime. He was well-equipped to work throughout the night, as he had done many times before, sitting on his tractor and ploughing his fields for the next few hours. Oddly enough, as Antonio was working, he then claimed to see the same bright red star that he had witnessed on the previous night, hovering overhead. Although the bright red star was an anomaly, he wasn't too worried by it as he and his brother had already seen the red light on the previous night, to which it seemingly displayed no strange patterns other than having moved a few times before. Unfortunately, however, Antonio Vilas Boas was alone, without the aid of his brother, and so the situation would not be the same as the previous day.

He continued to work, unsure of what he was seeing, keeping an eye on the strange red star seemingly unmoving across the sky but appearing brighter and closer than the previous night. A few more moments passed before he began to notice that the red star was growing in size. Worried it could be any number of things, he quickly stopped working and looked over at the bright red light trying to figure out what it could have been. He then began to realize that the bright red star wasn't growing in size but that it was definitely some form of an aircraft quickly approaching his position. It was not long before he could make out the shape of the craft; a roughly circular or egg-shaped aerial craft with a bright red light at the front and a strange rotating tower protruding from the top, as the entire aircraft seemingly hovered without any visible mechanisms for propulsion.

As the aircraft began to descend near the location of Antonio Vilas Boas, it began to protrude three extended legs to support the craft as it landed in the nearby fields. After seeing the craft descend, Antonio Vilas Boas quickly put his tractor into gear and tried to leave the area as fast as he could. After only a few seconds, however, his tractor completely died, as all of the lights on the tractor shut off and its engine suddenly stopped. Believing the strange aircraft to have been responsible for the sudden shut-off, Antonio quickly jumped from the tractor and began running on foot through the fields, away from the landed craft.

As Antonio was running, falling in and out of the soft, recently ploughed field, he was quickly captured by a small, five foot tall, humanoid creature, wearing grey coveralls and a helmet. Though it is not specified whether or not the creature's helmet was that of a completely airtight system, or merely a protective gear worn on the head, Antonio Vilas Boas does not specify that he was able to see the entirety of the humanoids' face that grabbed him. He only states that he noticed its eyes were small and blue and that, as it spoke, it made noises similar to that of a bark or yelping sound.

Shortly after the first humanoid seized Antonio, three more humanoids of similar description joined in and subdued him, rapidly dragging him by force inside of their aircraft as he fought to try to get away. Once dragged inside, the humanoid creatures then began to take Antonio's clothes off as they then began to cover him from head to toe in a gelatinous compound.

After being completely covered by the gelatinous compound, Antonio then described an overwhelming feeling of calmness that prevented him from fighting back, leaving many to assume that the strange gelatinous compound had some sort of drug-like effect on him. As he entered this new docile state, the humanoid figures led him towards a large semicircular room through a tight doorway that had a number of mysterious red symbols written all over it. It was at this point, when Antonio entered the room, that the true nature of the humanoid figures became obvious.

The figures began to take samples of blood from Antonio's chin, leaving behind a deep mark that would later prove as evidence of the encounter, as the scar would last for over two years before properly healing. These figures then led him into a third room where they pumped a large amount of gas into the chamber that made Antonio violently ill. As Antonio was gasping for breath, believing he would soon be killed, he saw the main door into the chamber open with a naked female humanoid creature standing in front of him.

The female humanoid creature was described by Antonio Vilas Boas as being five feet tall, a height that was similar to the other beings he had encountered. The female humanoid also seemed to possess large, blue, cat-like eyes that made her appear to be inhuman. Additional facial features included a small, pointed chin. On her head she had long, platinum-blonde hair and had visible hair on her underarm and groin that were bright red.

Shortly after entering the chamber, the female humanoid then began to force sexual acts upon Antonio Vilas Boas, making a number of animalistic groans that he claimed scared and disgusted him as the creature began to bite at his chin. When they were finished, Antonio Vilas Boas describes a feeling of terrible disgust washing over him as the creature began to rub her stomach and then point upwards. Leading him to believe that she was explaining that she would become pregnant with his child and raise it on a different planet.

Following this experience, Antonio was then given back his clothes by the other humanoids and was given a tour of the ship. While taking this tour, he had attempted to steal a small clock-like device to show proof of his encounter with the alien race, but was quickly caught by the aliens and was immediately escorted off of the ship.

As the ship left, he returned home to find that more than four hours had passed since the ship touched down, one of the strange side effects he would soon begin experiencing. Following the alien encounter, Antonio began showing signs of extreme radiation sickness. Unaware of what was happening, with growing lesions, nasua, weakness and terrible headaches, he quickly sought help from a journalist researching alien abductions and was examined by Dr. Olavo Fontes of the National School of Medicine of Brazil. Antonio had originally believed he had caught a form of extraterrestrial STD but was informed that he was suffering from a sickness caused by taking massive doses of radiation at one time.

Written in Dr. Olavo Fontes' report is the following:

"Among [Boas's] symptoms were 'pains throughout the body, nausea, headaches, loss of appetite, ceaselessly burning sensations in the eyes, cutaneous lesions at the slightest of light bruising...which went on appearing for months, looking like small reddish nodules, harder than the skin around them and protuberant, painful when touched, each with a small central orifice yielding a yellowish thin waterish discharge.' The skin surrounding the wounds presented 'a hyperchromatic violet-tinged area."

Such levels of radiation sickness would have been impossible to have been exposed to during this time, in the 1950's, and would have required Antonio to have gotten hit by direct doses of radiation equal to the amount that would later be experienced at the chernobyl incident in Ukraine not until the 1980's, overwhelmingly proving advanced technologies had been within the vicinity of Antonio Vilas Boas within the span of time he had claimed the alien abduction event to have occurred.

Canadian Multiple Disappearances: Cindy Lou & Tony Richard

On the ninth of September, back in 1958, a series of bizarre disappearances would cause the small communities of both Willow River and Bonnet Hill of Canada's British Columbia to enter into a state of shock and frenzy when two toddlers would suddenly vanish under impossible to explain circumstances. The first toddler to disappear, a young two year old girl by the name of Cindy Lou Maclane had last been seen by her mother, a twenty two year old woman by the name of Gladys Maclane, playing outside in their front yard.

To provide context as to the locations of the two disappearances, the small communities of Willow River and Bonnet Hill have less than twelve roads running into each other and appear to be separated from other locations by running rivers and untamed wilderness and forest surrounding the perimeters of the small towns. Both Willow River and Bonnet Hill are equidistant to Fraser River which forms a large triangle when taking all three points into consideration, an area known for a small bear population that often uses Fraser River as a source of freshwater and fish. Despite a steady bear population and the perimeters of the towns covered in wilderness, disappearances in the area are completely uncommon and crime rates are considered some of the lowest across the entire country of Canada.

According to Gladys Maclane, she had been inside the house doing chores, while her husband had been working at the local lumber mill that employed the majority of the men in the small town. As she was finishing up her chores for the day, she saw her young two year old daughter outside in the front yard walking around and playing, as was common for many of the children in the town to do. Oddly enough, within the span of a few minutes, Gladys looked outside and was unable to spot Cindy Lou anywhere near the front yard. Although at first she was unconcerned, believing that the young girl was most likely wandering around the property and most likely in a spot Gladys was unable to see from inside the house, when Gladys exited her home, she called out for Cindy Lou to return but got no reply.

Fearing that she may have wandered into the nearby roadways, Gladys walked around and searched the surrounding property but failed to see any sign of Cindy Lou in the area. Additionally, the Maclane household rested at the outermost perimeter of the city in an area where next to no vehicular traffic was seen, and no sign or sound of vehicles in the area passed by within the time of Cindy Lou's disappearance. Immediately, Gladys began to panic, believing that her daughter may have wandered into the nearby woods and wilderness. Due to the fact that the small town of Willow River is adjacent to many wild bear populations, Gladys contacted the local Royal Canadian Mounted Police, also known as the RCMP, and the search and rescue of Cindy Lou Maclane was underway within a few minutes of her reported disappearance, at around 9:00 in the morning.

Without hesitation, several hundred volunteers, comprised of Mr Maclane, his coworkers, residents within the town, members of the RCMP and wilderness experts began their search for two year old Cindy Lou Maclane, working in concentric circles, covering every square inch of ground across a radius of several miles. After twenty four hours, however, no sign of Cindy Lou was uncovered and no evidence of her having travelled through dense wilderness seemed apparent. Given the fact that Cindy Lou was only two years old, it was believed that she could not have travelled very far from where she had last been seen, however, as the search radius increased, less and less volunteers were confident that the young girl was lost anywhere near the area.

After the first day passed and the search parties failed to locate Cindy Lou, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police sponsored a series of radio broadcasts that asked for more volunteers from the surrounding area to join in the search for two year old Cindy Lou, providing information of her appearance, where she had last been seen and the time of her disappearance, as well as providing a statement that any information that could help recover Cindy Lou would be beneficial for the search party, possibly hinting that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police started to have suspicions that perhaps Cindy had been abducted from her front yard and had not merely wandered off nearby.

Shortly after the radio broadcasts, all of the local lumber mills throughout the area closed down and nearly every able bodied person in the town joined in the search for the young girl. Additionally, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police established several sentries stationed out deep in the woods at the end of every night with the task of listening for any sounds that could lead them to Cindy Lou, such as crying or shouting. Unfortunately, after several days, the sentries had failed to hear anything and no sign of Cindy Lou anywhere in the area was recovered.

By the end of the sixth day of searching, the report surrounding the missing girl claims that search parties were growing increasingly desperate and led several hunts to find and hunt down native black bears that had been sighted throughout the wilderness during their search, over the course of the six days, several dozen black bears had been killed and gutted to look for the remains of Cindy Lou, yet none of the bears appeared to have eaten the girl. Before long, the local bear population was hunted to extinction.

Oddly enough, on the seventh day of Cindy Lou's disappearance, reported on the sixteenth of September, 1958, sometime around 3:00 PM. Another young two year old toddler would go missing within twelve miles of Cindy Lou's last known location, by the name of Tony Richard Beauchamp. According to the official search and rescue reports, As the search for Cindy Lou Maclane was winding down, roughly twelve miles away in the small community of Bonnet Hill, a young two year old boy by the name of Tony Richard Beauchamp was last seen playing in his front yard with his brothers and sisters as they were waiting for their father, Gilbert Beauchamp, to come home who was working at the local lumber mill.

According to Tony's brothers and sisters, it was at around 3:00 PM when the siblings claimed that Tony suddenly walked a few feet down a nearby rural road located next to their property. When they asked Tony what he was doing, he said that he was looking for dad. As he took a few more steps down the road, however, the siblings all claimed that Tony suddenly vanished, as if he turned a corner and was no longer in the area. Panicked by what they had seen, the siblings went around the area looking for Tony but were unable to find where he had wandered off to. Having known about the strange disappearance of young Cindy Lou, the family immediately contacted the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to search for and return young Tony Richard.

At the time of Tony's disappearance, he was last reported as wearing rubber boots, blue jeans, and a light blue sweater. Shortly after the RCMP began their search and volunteer search and rescue split their efforts between the two children, a boot was supposedly recovered that looked to be the same style and size that Tony had last been seen wearing. Similar to the disappearance of Cindy Lou, however, no sign of Tony other than the recovered boot was found anywhere near the area.

With the growing disappearances of two year old children, the RCMP started to wonder if an organised group of human trafficking agents were in the area, choosing easy to snatch targets to smuggle through the region. After contacting different organisations, the search and rescue efforts appeared to take on a far darker tone, resulting in the investigation of the involved parties and new organisations joining the search. Although the disappearances would happen in the small towns of British Columbia, located within Canada, it appears that for some unknown reason, the United States Air Force became involved with the search and provided aerial support to begin looking for the missing children in the area.

On the 18th of September, 1958, a United States air force pilot referred to as Captain George Knight, had been flying over the Willow River and Bonnet Hill region when he noticed a large oil pipeline from the sky that served as a landmark point for his search. As he was flying over the pipeline, which he remarked as appearing similar to a large electrical line, he claimed to have seen a small oddly shaped figure near the pipeline covered in a light bluish colour. At around 2:00 PM, Tony Richard Beauchamp was recovered from the area, appearing to have been following the oil pipeline only to have fallen unconscious nearby the structure. An article in the Lethbridge Herald would provide the following official statement on Tony's recovery:

"a two year old boy, missing twenty-three hours from his home near here was found asleep near a pipeline right of way, wednesday, about two miles from his home"

Oddly enough, search and rescue volunteers claim that the area Tony Richard had been found had already been searched by the volunteers but nothing was seen in the area. Additionally, it would have been incredibly difficult for Tony to have travelled two miles through thick forest within the span of almost two days out in the cold surrounding wilderness. When Tony was recovered, it appeared almost as if he had been placed in the area and left unconscious for search and rescue to locate.

Fortunately, Tony was returned back to his residence and made a complete recovery, with no evidence of hypothermia or injuries or damage to his clothes. Oddly enough, the search for Cindy Lou Maclane continued for a few days but appeared to have dwindled to a stand still shortly after, and no statements surrounding whether or not Cindy Lou was ever recovered are known today. Although Tony was found within a two mile radius of his home, Cindy Lou's search continued for another fifteen miles but was unable to locate any sign or the young girl. To this day, it is not explained why the United States Air Force got involved with the search of two missing children and the investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police into the bizarre disappearances of children of the same age within seven days of each other was never pursued.

Some theorists believe that perhaps Tony had been returned after the involvement of the United States Air Force to get the search and rescue teams to give up on the investigation as the search for Cindy Lou had already been coming to a close. It could mean that as soon as other organisations got involved, a secret group responsible for the disappearances feared they would soon be discovered and so attempted to cover up their kidnapping by returning Tony but not Cindy Lou, who had already been missing for eight to nine days when Tony was returned back to his residence.

Even more peculiar, however, is that the location of Tony's disappearance, although twelve miles away from Cindy Lou's residence, touches the same woods and wilderness that Cindy Lou was believed to have wandered into. To this day, the small towns of Bonnet Hill and Willow River are still considered tiny communities that have yet to grow in population, some attribute the disappearances to the lack of growth for the community as no new individuals wish to move their families to the small town after learning about the impossible to explain disappearances of the toddlers.

The Account Of Linda Porter (1963)

Though the report wasn't written until 1991, the case of Linda Porter and her alien abduction encounters, that took place back in 1963, help to paint an even more important picture for that of alien intervention and abduction. The story was first told by that of famed reporter and regional Emmy winner Linda Moulton Howe, of whom was contacted by Linda Porter after receiving a package through the mail containing an audio cassette, a written letter and drawings from Linda Porter. The letter detailed the Account of Linda Porter that informed the journalist of her abduction that took place back in 1963 in Covina, California. According to Linda Porter, she had been abducted by grey aliens when she was a young child, only roughly 15 years old, and experienced experiments that she referred to as soul transfers.

Linda Porter claimed that as she was taken up into an extraterrestrial spacecraft, she had seen a large praying mantis-like creature that could communicate with her telepathically and detail a vast amount of information surrounding the universe. Shortly after this confrontation, she claimed to have switched bodies into that of a cloned body via a soul transfer. She was told by the extraterrestrial beings that her other body had had a bad heart and that she would have soon passed away had they not intervened but that her new body would be far healthier and stronger for her to use.

Shortly after this transfer, she witnessed a number of other abductees in large vats or containers of whom were being studied by the extraterrestrials as the nature of a human soul was quite unknown to the extraterrestrials inhabiting the spacecraft. Additionally, Linda Porter claimed to have seen a number of surrounding grey aliens that stood beside the massive prey mantis-like alien and seemed to have been operating as a hive mind as they communicate telepathically. This behaviour led her to believe that the function of their civilization is based primarily off of telepathic communication to prevent misinterpretation of far more complex ideas.

No further information surrounding her abductions could be known and outside of her audio cassettes tapes and drawn images, no other data can be gathered.

B-52 Bomber Abduction 1960's

An interesting military report surrounding human disappearances and expirations was claimed to have occurred during the late 1960's when a US Air Force member was serving as a photographer in Vietnam. According to the Ex US Air Force members 1989 UFO Conference held in Las Vegas, the photographer was involved in a top secret mission to investigate the crash of a Boeing B-52 Stratofortress Bomber that had been in use throughout the Vietnam War at the time. As he journeyed to the location as to where the airplane had supposedly gone down, he noticed that the craft was resting perfectly intact in the middle of the jungle, as if it had been expertly placed there to be recovered at a later time.

When the photographer landed nearby via helicopter, he began to check inside the plane for survivors, believing that it could have been possible that the pilot somehow landed the plane intact despite the nearly impossible conditions to have done so. When entering the aircraft, however, it became immediately obvious that a safe landing was not the case. The photographer discovered the bodies of the four manned crew, still strapped into their seats but having been expired with clean surgical cuts similar to the animal expirations seen all across the world. Shortly thereafter, the photographer was ordered to burn the craft along with the bodies once adequate photographs were taken to recreate the scene for study at a later time.

The Abduction of Fran Drescher 1963-1973

Seen in popular television shows such as the Nanny and a smaller part in Happily Divorced, Fran Drescher became a common household name to many during the late 80's. Interestingly enough, the star also claimed to have had the strangest alien abduction story, along with a witness to corroborate the alien encounter. Back in 2010, Fran Drescher came out to many different news outlets including the Huffington Post and numerous talk shows about her bizarre alien encounters in her youth.

She claimed that as she was on a late night drive with her father, they spotted a strange light in the sky. Unfortunately, the details after she and her father spotted the strange light seem to get blurry; however, Drescher claims that she soon developed a scar on her hand where she remembers the aliens implanting some strange device inside her. Years later, she would meet a man named Peter Marc Jacobson, a man who had a very similar story to Fran's. Peter also claimed that he encountered an alien abduction driving with his father and had the same strange scar to match. Fran Drescher believed them to have been programmed to have met given the fact that Fran had a significant role in the show Happily Divorced where she met Peter, who was working as the producer and one of the writers for the show before they soon married.

The William Schaffner UFO Interception

One of the strangest UFO incidents in history, an encounter that would result in the death of a Royal Air force pilot would be reported on the 8th of September back in 1970, and lead to serious investigations made by the British Ministry of Defence following the impossible to explain event. According to the military reports, the Royal Air Force pilot, known as William Schaffner, was tasked with intercepting a peculiar air craft that had first been spotted on radar by three different independent radar detection stations including the Royal Air Force base Fylingdales early radar warning station, the United States Air Force Thule Air Base radar station located in Greenland and the Colorado Springs Radar base at the Cheyenne Mountain Complex in Colorado USA. Fearing that the object was some form of unknown advanced air craft, William Schaffner was given the order to intercept the object over the North Sea and engage in a firefight if necessary. Unfortunately for the Royal Air Force Pilot, that would be the last time that Willaim Schaffner would ever be seen. Radar detected his plane dropping from its height and shortly thereafter, William Schaffner was declared dead. Roughly four months later, the air craft of William Schaffner would be recovered from the sea bed. Oddly enough, the entire plane was relatively untouched, with the main body of the plane staying enclosed underwater. When investigators looked inside the craft to better understand what could have happened to the pilot, they quickly noticed that his body was nowhere to be found within the completely enclosed air craft.

Alien Abduction Of Gabriella Versacci 1973

Often described by UFO researchers as one of the first alien abduction reports made in the United Kingdom at the time, the abduction of Gabriella Versacci demonstrated the almost apathetic nature of humanoid aliens and what they seem to be capable of when it comes to the illegal experimentation of human beings against their will. First reported on the 16th of October, back in 1973, a woman by the name of Gabriella Versacci claims to have been taken aboard an alien spaceship. According to her alien abduction account, Gabriella Versacci was driving down the motorway passing by the Langford Budville exit, outside of the small village of Somerset, England. She noticed that the motorway was completely deserted except for the blinding glare of a single head light that appeared to be in the distance, remaining stationary in its position. As she continued driving forward, getting closer to the bright light, her car suddenly lost all power and her engine completely stalled. Uncertain as to the cause of the sudden engine stall, Gabriella Versacci exited the car and lifted her car hood to fix what could have been the issue for her car suddenly losing power.

It was at this moment that Gabriella Versacci claimed that a large hand suddenly grabbed her by the shoulder and forced her to the ground in front of her car, as an overwhelmingly loud humming sound could be heard at deafening audibility. As she fought against her unseen attacker, she turned to face the figure only to see what she described as a tall, metallic-colored humanoid figure that appeared to be far more robot than human. It was at this moment that the robotic figure began to flash what she described as a multi-colored flickering light that floated into her view. She slowly felt herself losing consciousness as the flickering multi-colored light came into her view, causing her to black out beside her car. After an unknown period of time, Gabriella Versacci awoke in an empty field, already standing, alongside the robotic figure that stood beside her and a strange bright object that floated nearby to them. She quickly matched the humming sound she heard before passing out to the bright object that floated nearby that also seemed to have been generating a loud humming noise as it levitated.

As she got a better look at the unidentified flying object, Gabriella described the craft as being shaped similar to that of a half-moon or dome-like in nature, with a rounded top and a completely flat bottom. The levitating craft's color was silvery gray and the entire craft extended out thick legs that it appeared to rest on. Although she could only see two of the extended legs, Gabriella believed there to have been more, as the two legs she could see did not appear to be able to support the weight of the craft alone. Standing on its metallic legs, the craft appeared to be more than twenty feet in height, forty feet in diameter, and large oblong shaped windows in the middle of the dome-shape of the craft that poured out the bright light of the craft. Overwhelmed by the space craft, the robotic figure and her abduction, she would black out for a second time before waking up inside the craft itself.

According to Gabriella, when she awoke inside the craft, she was in what she described as a completely circular room and was forcibly strapped down to an examination table that was located in the center of the room. Despite being covered in a light blue blanket made of an unknown material, she was completely naked and bound to the examination table with large rubber bands that forced her limbs apart and held down her wrists and ankles. As she glanced around the room, she felt as if the room was artificially cooled, with her body freezing on the metallic table, shivering in the cold. She noticed the robotic figure standing inactive towards one of the walls of the room while a console sat to her right covered in a wide number of carrying buttons and dials. She took special note when memorizing her surroundings, trying to find any significance in their creation, including memorizing the floor of the room that she described as being covered in what appeared to be a dark colored rubber matting.

After a period of time of being restrained, three figures entered the circular room carrying boxes and cubes. Each of the figures appeared to be about five and a half feet tall, slim in build, wearing face masks, skull caps, tunics, long gloves that went up the length of their elbows and extremely long aprons that fell to their ankles, with every piece of their clothing being light blue in color, with emotionless humanoid eyes that were far more rounded than a normal human beings eyes. It was at this moment that the figures began performing a series of medical examinations on her body; including gathering hair and nail samples, taking vials of her blood and prodding her in different areas with probing equipment. As the procedure took place, Gabriella noticed that the humanoid figures never breathed or talked to each other throughout the entire examination, merely looking and nodding to each other occasionally.

Throughout the procedure, however, as she made several motions with her head towards the robotic figure, one of the three figures began to tell her what the purpose of the metallic colored robotic humanoid was. They described that the humanoid was indeed a robot and was tasked with the sole purpose of finding and retrieving specimens to be studied by those aboard the strange craft, and that it would not be active again until the end of the procedure. As the figure spoke to Gabriella, however, she noticed that its mouth did not seem to move and no air seemed to be exhaled as it spoke, believing that it was possible that the figure was communicating telepathically with her throughout its explanations. Once the explanations were over, the nature of the exam went from an emotionless one to that of an exam far more sinister in nature. According to Gabriella Versacci, although she refuses to describe the event in detail, she claims to have been the victim of a sexual attack from the three figures that forcibly attempted to impregnate her for reasons not entirely understood.

After the procedure was over, the robotic figure flashed multi-colored lights once more, causing Gabriella Versacci to fall asleep once again. This time, she woke up outside her car on the deserted road. Completely distraught, she quickly got in her car and found that it was working again with no noticeable issues whatsoever. She then drove home and immediately filed a report as to the impossible-to-explain UFO encounter and alien abduction event.

Pascagoula Alien Abduction 1973

Back in 1973, when coworkers Charles Hickson and Calvin Parker had the day off, the two men took a short vacation to a less popular fishing spot located off of the pier found at the West Bank of the Pascagoula River, in the state of Mississippi. It was on the evening of the 11th of October, as they were fishing, that the two men would both experience a terrifying alien encounter. The men claimed that they first heard an ominous whirring or whining sound, like a motor winding up from far away. Shortly after hearing this noise, they turned to look up and saw two brilliantly flashing blue lights above them, with a hovering oval shaped object between the two lights that was described as being an estimated forty feet in width and ten feet in height.

It was at this point in their encounter that their stories slightly diverged in their personal accounts. Calvin Parker would later tell Jackson County sheriff’s that shortly after sighting the craft, he had fallen unconscious, unable to remember anything that happened thereafter. However, Charles Hickson would give a detailed account of the two men suddenly becoming paralyzed and lifted into the large craft hovering above them to be the subjects of horrible experimentation and examination. According to Charles Hickson, the ship was manned by strange creatures that were described as having robotic slits for mouths and large crab-like pinchers. Although there could have been more, Charles claimed to have seen three of these creatures as they experimented on the two men for several hours before being released.

Immediately following the encounter, the two men went to the Jackson county sheriff's department and filed a report as to their extraterrestrial encounter. In disbelief of the claims, one of the officers demanded the two men take a lie detector test to answer questions surrounding the legitimacy of their claim. Charles Hickson tested truthfully across all questions regarding the alien encounter. Pascagoula would later become the center of an international news story of the alien encounter following this report and Charles Hickson would go on to be one of the most vocal proponents for the alien awareness movement, claiming that extraterrestrials would visit him several times more throughout his life.

The Abduction of Judy Doraty 1973

A recurring theme surrounding that of extraterrestrial abduction stories is that many alien abductees are unaware of being victims of an abduction until therapeutic hypnosis allows them to unlock repressed memories seemingly locked away from their conscious minds. This also appears to be the case with the witness account of Judy Doraty.

According to the Doraty case, back in 1973, four witnesses were travelling home to Texas City when they encountered a strange light that was described as hovering above them in the night sky. The four witnesses, Judy Doraty, her daughter Cindy, Judy's mother and Judy's sister in law, all exited the vehicle to get a better look at the strange hovering craft. Despite nothing happening, the group of people claimed they felt as if a long period of time had passed despite having no recollection of the time and, shortly after this unexplainable time confusion, the light began to hover away and then disappear into the distance.

Immediately following the event, Judy Doraty and several of the members of the group began complaining of severe migraine headaches, generalized anxiety and trouble sleeping following the encounter. After visiting a handful of doctors, all of whom believed that the systems were most likely physical manifestations of stress, Judy Doraty visited with Dr. Leo Sprinkle, a well known Ufologist and trained hypnotist, to help alleviate her stress. Once under hypnosis, Judy Doraty began to uncover repressed memories of an alien abduction encounter that took place during the sighting that the four witnesses made only several weeks prior.

According to Doraty, and later corroborated by her daughter after she had also undergone hypnosis therapy, the four women were taken aboard the craft and witnessed two small alien entities perform a series of surgeries and experiments. The event began as Judy Doraty claimed, while under hypnosis, that she felt the impossible feeling of being in two places at once, as if holding conflicting memories of her standing outside of her car while her alternate memory recounts being taken up into the alien ship, as if the memories of her standing beside the car were implanted over her real memories of abduction. She would provide the additional statement surrounding their abduction and ascension into the vehicle via a light made out of strange substance:

"It's like a spotlight shining down on the back of my car. And it's like it has substance to it. I can see an animal being taken up in this. I can see it squirming and trying to get free. And It's like it's being sucked up."

The first experiment they witnessed was of the small entities cutting apart a cow and removing its organs for study. Throughout the experiment, the women claimed that they could feel the thoughts and emotions of the small alien entities and could feel how robotic and inhuman they were. Judy Doraty herself claimed that the alien creatures possessed no form of empathy and were merely curious creatures with no concept of emotional bias when it came to the pained screams of the bovine creature during its mutilation, causing her own fear to grow that the alien creatures were capable of far more sinister actions without a conscience.

Following the cow mutilation, Judy Doraty claimed to have seen her daughter being placed on the operating table as the aliens began taking a variety of samples from her, however, Judy nor the daughter would go into detail about the nature of the operation or what they witnessed, with her only statement being the following quote:

"They don't listen, they just ignore me…. Go about their work as if it's nothing. They don't seem to have any emotions. They don't seem to care. They just take some samples from her…"

Once the hypnosis therapy was finished, Judy's symptoms cleared up almost immediately and she remarked that normalcy resumed back into her life as her anxiety was nearly completely alleviated. Although skeptics have continued to deny her claims, all witnesses confirm each others stories and leave behind a grave warning that visiting alien life is far more sinister not because of some sadistic pleasure, but because the entities are far less human than anyone could have ever imagined and will do anything they wish to satiate their own curiosity, even if such actions lead to the harm of those around them.

White Sands Missile Testing Range Abduction 1976

It was not until the late 1980's that a handful of researchers would come together to investigate and document the case of an Air Force E-6 Sergeant that was reportedly the victim of an impossible-to-explain expiration, with direct evidence of a flying saucer sighting to support the claims of extraterrestrial intervention. Back in 1976, an Air Force Sergeant by the name of Jonathon P. Louette, was reported missing when stationed at the White Sands missile test range, back in March of that year. According to a Senior Officer's report, The Sergeant and the Senior Officer were sent to travel several miles nearby the missile testing area to recover large amounts of debris that were believed to have been the product of used missiles.

After a period of time recovering debris, the two military personnel split up to cover more ground looking for debris in the surrounding desert, believing that the remaining pieces would be small enough for one person to carry. It was during their separation that the Senior Officer claimed to have heard the screams of the Air Force Sergeant from the direction of where the Sergeant had left to go searching for the missile debris. After crossing several dunes that were blocking the view of the Sergeants position, the Senior Officer claimed to have seen a large disk-shaped aircraft hovering low above the ground. According to the Officer, a single long metallic tentacle was coming out from the underside of the craft and was wrapped around the body of the Air Force Sergeant as it dragged the Sergeant into the craft and then suddenly shot away at a tremendous speed.

Immediately after this sighting, the Senior Officer returned to the military base and reported what happened, but was unfortunately arrested by military officers who believed he had fabricated the story and had disposed of the Sergeant. Shortly after his arrest, military investigators began searching the immediate areas surrounding the missile test range in order to recover the body of the missing Sergeant, but were unable to recover any evidence of foul play. Over the next three days, the Senior Officer was held at the military base for investigation and was court martialed for the first degree. After three days, however, the body of the Air Force Sergeant was recovered twenty miles away from the missile testing range and provided a substantial amount of evidence surrounding the Senior Officer's claims. The wounds were made with clinical and precise marks, with the genitals, rectum and eyes completely removed from the body. Despite the fact that the cardiovascular organs had not been removed or collapsed, there was no blood found on or within the body, as if the remains had been completely drained of any bodily fluids. Shortly after the body was recovered, the Senior Officer was released from custody without charges.

Elsie Oakensen Witness Report 1978

Later referred to as the Elsie Oakensen witness report, at around 5:15 P.M., on the 22nd of November, back in 1978, a woman by the name of Elsie Oakensen would witness one of the strangest unidentified flying object sightings ever reported throughout the United Kingdom. According to Elsie Oakensen, as she was driving down the A5, south of the Weedon Bec in Northamptonshire, heading home, she saw two bright lights that flew beside one another, coming towards her car. One of the lights appeared to be a bright green with the other light appearing to be a bright red, with the space between the lights showing what she described as a dumbbell shaped aircraft that floated overhead. It was at this moment, as the dumbbell shaped craft passed overhead, that her car suddenly turned off and her engine stalled. This surprised Elsie Oakensen as she provided proof that less then a month prior to this sighting, her car had been completely serviced with no sudden cause for issues that could lead to her engine having naturally stalled.

In a bright flash of light, however, Elsie noticed that the sky went completely black and a brillight beam of white light landed on the road in front of her and slowly moved towards her car. Elsie would later notice that a period of about fifteen minutes completely disappeared from her memory as she awoke in her car with the color of the sky having already returned to normal. Although she would never know the truth, Elsie Oakensen feared that she could have been a victim of an alien abduction wiped from her memory, as time loss is indicative of abduction events

The Alien Abduction of Alan Godfrey

According to a now retired police officer by the name of Alan Godfrey, while working as police officer for the West Yorkshire Metropolitan Police Force, Alan Godfrey believes that he had been abducted by aliens while encountering an unidentified flying object during a routine police route. According to Alan Godfrey, he had been in the middle of a strange investigation involving a large amount of cattle that had been seen wandering around a local council estate that was located in Todmorden West Yorkshire during the middle of the day on the 28th of November back in 1980. As he located the cattle, he claimed to have encountered a massive unidentified flying object that was described as being roughly diamond shaped, estimated at being about twenty feet tall and 14 feet in diameter. Godfrey had made several attempts to radio in for help, however, he found that as he attempted to use the radio, no signal was getting through. Shortly after, the object suddenly disappeared, however, Godfrey realized that more than twenty five minutes had passed with no recollection as he stood more than 30 yards away from his vehicle.

According to Alan Godfrey, he made several attempts to remember what had happened to him before he visited a man named Harry Harris who provided Alan Godfrey with a Hypnotic Regression therapy session to allow him to unlock his blocked memories. During this hypnosis, Godfrey remembered that he had been blinded by a bright beam of light that caused him to pass out. Several moments later, he had woken up inside a large room where he was medically examined by several small beings and a tall humanoid figure with a large beard. Nothing else was remembered from these sessions however, and Alan Godfrey still searches for answers for what he experienced to this day.

Alfred Burtoo’s Alien Abduction

Back on the 12th of August, of 1983, a 77 year old man by the name of Alfred Burtoo reported an impossible to explain abduction event that have left many, including experienced ufo researchers, wondering as to the validity of the encounter and what it could mean when it comes to the alien abduction phenomenon. According to Alfred Burtoo, he had been quietly fishing for several hours on the Basingstoke Canal when he heard a strange noise nearby. When he left his fishing spot to go investigate, he claimed to have seen a large unidentified flying object that had landed nearby to the Basingstoke Canal. It was at this point in his encounter that he noticed two humanoid beings that began to motion to him to come closer to their ship and enter the massive disk shaped air craft. Although the memory is blurred, Alfred Burtoo recalled that as he approached the humanoid beings, he remembers being escorted inside the craft and medically examined on an examination table in the middle of the saucer. During his examination, the humanoid shaped beings were said to have spoken perfect english to him throughout the entire procedure. After a period of time however, Alfred claimed that he was rejected and told to leave the ship because he was far too old to be of any use to them.

The Ilkley Moor Incident

Many have often referred to the Ilkley Moor incident as one of the most compelling pieces of evidence surrounding the claims of alien abduction. This is due, in part, to the photographic evidence that had been gathered of the event by the witness that claimed he had later been abducted by the extraterrestrial being he had encountered.

According to the alien report, a man by the name of Philip Spencer had moved to the West Yorkshire area after leaving his old job to be closer with his family. Prior to this move, Philip Spencer had worked as a police officer for more than four years and was more than respected as a hardworking and honest citizen. During his move to West Yorkshire, he had noticed a strange number of lights often seen in the fog. Many others would confirm their sightings of these strange lights as well but would often retort that it was probably lights from airplanes flying around the military bases and airports nearby.

These strange claims led Philip Spencer to buy a high end camera at the time in the attempt to gather evidence of these foggy lights and look into the increasingly weird rumors being told throughout the area. As Philip Spencer then went out the next day in the early morning to capture some pictures, he began to notice that some strange figure was following him in the fog. He would then quickly snap a photo of the creature only to find that it was a small humanoid, almost alien-like creature that had been running through the fog near him. Without thinking, he chased the entity until he noticed a large dome-shaped aerial craft lift from the ground near him and take off into the sky.

It wasn’t long before Philip Spencer then began running back into town, noticing that more than an hour had gone missing between his sighting of the craft and the moments shortly after it disappeared. Today, the picture taken proves to be one of the biggest pieces of evidence of the small grey aliens often reported by alien abductees. Additionally, many have claimed that the lost amount of time experienced by Spencer may have been an abduction event that was later wiped from his memory after the encounter, shrouding that time in complete mystery.

The Recovery Of Six Year Old Cody Sheehy

On the twenty seventh of April, back in 1986, a young six year old boy by the name of Cody Sheehy would be reported missing sometime around 2:30 PM when his ten year old sister and his mother would have trouble finding Cody after he had walked into the nearby wilderness during a family picnic. The family had planned the trip to the Blue mountains outside of Wallowa Oregon, roughly twenty six miles from the Washington State border, while the father was out on a business trip in China, to serve as a mini relaxing vacation for the family. After hiking nearly four thousand feet in elevation, Cody's mother, Marcie Sheehy, decided to take a break from the long hike and told the children to play nearby within earshot as she would prepare a picnic area for them to enjoy.

According to Cody's sister, ten year old Carrie Sheehy, it was common for the two siblings to play a game they referred to as "Explorers" in which they would each take turns walking out in different directions and return to where they were originally standing to describe what they had seen and discovered. Apparently, while the two were waiting for their mother to get the picnic ready, they were playing explorers when Cody failed to return at the same time that Carrie had. After waiting for a few minutes, Carrie would go out looking for Cody in the direction that she had seen him walk off in, while shouting his name, but was unable to see any sign of her younger brother.

Scared that something terrible had happened, Carrie quickly alerted her mom that she was unable to find Cody after he had wandered off somewhere nearby. After spending roughly half an hour more searching for Cody, at around 2:30 PM, Marcie Sheehy would contact the local law enforcement and report her six year old son missing. Within two hours of the call for assistance, the United States Forest Service, county sheriff and the state police all responded to the search and rescue demands, gathering more than 36 volunteers to join the search for young Cody Sheehy. Joining the search and rescue teams would be a few Bloodhound teams, several equestrian teams riding on horseback and an offer from the nearby airport to send up two helicopters in the area once conditions were made available.

Unfortunately for the search and rescue volunteers, the weather would take a sudden turn for the worst, bringing down heavy rain and strong winds that would prevent aerial support from joining in the search on the first night and being a general deterrent throughout the surrounding wilderness. It was believed that because of the rain, canine teams were unable to pick up Cody's scent, making it nearly impossible for the volunteers to get an accurate reading of where the six year old boy had ventured off to.

Despite searching in a radius of roughly three miles encircling where Cody had last been seen, while on horseback, no sign of Cody was uncovered. Investigators initially believed that Cody would have been recovered within a small radius of where he had last been seen, given the fact that he was only three feet and ten inches tall and weighed about forty lbs while on the side of a densely forested mountain side roughly four thousand feet in elevation, but as the search continued on throughout the night, the initial search radius was greatly expanded.

Estimated to have occurred sometime at around 7 O'clock in the morning on the following day, Cody would emerge from the Blue Mountains wilderness and knock on the front door of a home belonging to a woman by the name of Mrs. Beverly Hanson, who lived more than eighteen miles from where Cody had last been seen. Although Mrs. Hanson was not aware of a missing boy, she instantly knew that something was off after the child asked her for directions to his grandfather's ranch which was over thirty miles away from where they were standing. After telling six year old Cody that the ranch was much too far to walk, she told him to come inside and wait as she contacted the local sheriff's department.

Within the hour, law enforcement were at the Hanson residence, believing that Mrs. Beverly Hanson could have abducted the child, as her home was too far from the suspected location of where Cody had last been seen. It seemed highly implausible to the investigators that a child could have traveled eighteen miles down the side of a mountain, through dense wilderness, in the middle of a thunderstorm and still have enough energy to openly converse with Mrs. Hanson and the investigators unless he had been abducted by an individual who helped him travel the distance by vehicle.

Once investigators started questioning Cody Sheehy about his disappearance, several disturbing descriptions of impossible to explain circumstances would be detailed by the six year old boy, leading investigators to assume that Cody must have been hallucinating during his travels. According to Cody, he had stepped only a few feet away from where Carrie had last seen him when he saw a doglike face watching him from nearby. Believing that he was being chased by coyotes or wolves, Cody quickly ran from the animal deeper into the dense forest. After running for an indeterminate amount of time, occasionally catching glimpses of a wolf-like or dog-like face following him, Cody climbed a tree and hid inside its branches away from the stalking beasts.

While hiding in the tree, it was believed that Cody must have fallen asleep and woken in the middle of the night by the rain. Now completely lost in the woods, Cody climbed down from the tree and attempted to make his way back to where his mother and sister had last seen him but was unable to get his bearings straight. Cody would later claim that he became even more lost as a bright light in the sky, that he believed to have been a helicopter, started following him and attempted to grab him. Scared of the helicopter, Cody continued to run and hid from the light, as he traveled further away from where he had last been seen. At another point in time, Cody claimed that he had to hide from a machine that sounded like a loud roaring motorcycle passing through the dense wilderness looking for him.

Given the fact that the weather prevented helicopters from joining in the search on the first night, and search and rescue volunteers had been watching the skies in the area, investigators quickly dismissed Cody's story as nothing more than vivid hallucinations caused by a stressed mind. Regardless of this dismissal, it proved difficult for the investigators to explain just how Cody could have traveled eighteen miles in less than fourteen hours.

On the 29th of April, the local Hutchinson News would publish additional information about Cody's journey, claiming that Cody had been immediately taken to the hospital for observation and had been found to be in perfect health despite his dramatic travels.

On the 30th of April, three days after Cody's disappearance, an article about his recovery would be published in the local newspaper "The Beaver Times". The article would write the following paragraph about the incident:

"A 6-year-old boy walked overnight at least 18 miles to safety through the wilderness of northeastern Oregon while searchers on horseback combed the rugged terrain after he got lost on a picnic. Cody told his mother he climbed into a tree once during the night, afraid that he was being followed by coyotes. His mother said the boy told her he hid during the night from a motorcycle and a helicopter. There wasn't a helicopter out there at night, he must have been hallucinating, she said."

The Alien Abductions Of Scott & His Family

Back in November of 1991, an alien abductee victim would join an alien abduction support group after claiming to have been abducted by extraterrestrials over the course of his entire life. According to the man, who chose to go by the name Scott, he claimed that he only started to remember the extraterrestrial abduction events after years of suffering from terrible nightmares that appeared to have exacerbated feelings of both stress and anxiety. When dwelling on the nightmares for several years, the memories of strange humanoid creatures entering into his room started coming back to him but remained cloudy, as if he had been waking up from a dream.

According to Scott, the first alien abduction event that he could remember occurred some time back in April of 1990, in which he claimed that a group of small beings he would refer to as "short guys" would enter his room in seemingly impossible ways. Although, at first he was unsure, Scott believed the beings to have been connected with visions of hovering flying saucers and strange lights in the sky, as he claimed to have another hazy memory of having encountered a flying saucer when he was only ten years old. Desperate to figure out the cause of these strange memories and sudden anxieties, Scott attended several sessions with a therapist who would later refer Scott to a hypnosis psychiatrist who specialises in alien abduction cases.

It was during these several months of hypnosis sessions that Scott would slowly remember many of these bizarre experiences in vivid detail. The oldest abduction experience that Scott was able to remember during this time occurred when he was only three years old. According to Scott, he remembered playing in a dirt area outside of his home with his trucks when he realised that he was all alone. With his parents inside the house, Scott was having fun moving his trucks through the dirt and pretending to transport mounds of dirt to different areas when he saw movement out of the corner of his eye. The property that Scott was playing at rested adjacent to an untamed wilderness area and it was near the brush and trees of the adjacent wilderness that Scott claimed to have seen two humanoid beings appear from seemingly out of nowhere.

Being only three years old, Scott was unsure how to react to the situation and so continued looking over at the strange beings that he described as appearing to have had large ant-like heads with large ant-like eyes, atop tiny humanoid bodies only slightly taller than he was. As he continued staring at the creatures, Scott would claim that one of the ant-like beings pulled out a strange looking metal rod that he waved in Scott's direction and instantly caused him to fall asleep. He would then wake up an indeterminate amount of time later, laying down in the sand with his trucks and no one else around him. Terrified of what he encountered, Scott ran to his house and told his mother that he had fallen asleep after seeing monsters. Confused as to what Scott was trying to tell her, Scott's mother dismissed the sighting as nothing more than a dream that Scott had had while he was playing in the dirt.

Frustrated by his inability to tell his mom what had happened, Scott would shout at his mom saying "I saw big ants out there." and would continue saying this over the course of several weeks before forgetting about the encounter entirely due to some unknown reasons. Several years following this incident, Scott would begin to complain to his parents about throbbing headaches that would plague him for the rest of his life. Originally starting when he was only six years old, Scott was believed to have suffered from strange spells or seizures that he would describe to his parents as "strange feelings" "Spacing out" or "sudden confusional episodes" where he would be unable to know where he was or what he was doing. At first, the parents thought nothing of the headaches and sudden attacks of confusion, believing it was common for a young child to have momentary lapses. It would not be for another two years until Scott was diagnosed, at the age of eight, with a condition referred to as "atypical migraine."

Despite the doctors not knowing exactly what Scott was suffering from, he would be forced to take mild prescription painkillers until high school to deal with the sudden headaches. It was at around the age of eight that doctors decided to take a few readings from an electroencephalogram, also known as an EEG, to get readings of Scott's brain waves. Although his brain waves were typical, it was during his sudden migraines that Scott's brain waves suddenly began to show abnormal readings, as if he was no longer in a conscious state and would abruptly enter a stage between conscious and unconscious commonly seen in patients of hypnotic regressions. Confused as to what they were seeing, the doctor's assumed that the condition was being caused by mild seizures and would prescribe Scott with anticonvulsant medication that had very little effect on his confusion episodes.

It was around his ninth birthday that Scott would suffer from another alien abduction event that he would not recall for many years later. According to Scott, he and his sister Lee would often play outside in this hidden area they referred to as the Gully. It was at the Gully that Scott and his sister would claim to have witnessed a flying saucer and strange lights in the sky that moved erratically. Scott's sister Lee would also recall the events and claimed that she had believed the Gully to have been a very special place and that the hovering ships had visited them several times while they were alone.

It would not be until Scott was around twelve to thirteen that he would claim to suffer from vivid hallucinations. Although Scott was unaware of his hallucinations, notes from medical professionals concerning his case had written down what he had told his doctors during a routine check up. According to the Doctor's notes, Scott had complained of seeing a spinning colored triangle and a feminine figure staring at him standing over his bed while he was trying to sleep. Other recorded hallucinations claim that Scott had seen this feminine figure at other times, standing near him while he had been outdoors and standing outside a car door when he had been camping and sleeping within the car. Doctors were hesitant to connect the sightings with the migraines as they were unsure of whether or not the hallucinations were merely misremembered nightmares, but by age fifteen, Scott's medical records would describe these episodes and claim that one of the symptoms of his illness was "visual hallucinations".

By the time Scott turned nineteen, he felt increasingly dissatisfied with medical professionals and claimed that his doctors were practising hit or miss drugging, a slang term that meant the doctors had no idea what they were doing and were merely prescribing any kind of medication to solve Scott's problems. His last visit would occur sometime around this time when a visit to the doctor would reveal normal EEG signatures and his prescription medication would be discontinued. Scott would never visit a doctor for his migraines for the foreseeable future.

Scott would later believe that the strange migraines and shifts of consciousness were somehow connected to the alien abductions and that whenever his head was hurt, he was opening up a two way telepathic channel between his thoughts and a nearby extraterrestrials. According to Scott, when the strange humanoid creatures would visit, the creatures would often communicate with him via an unknown and mysterious telepathic ability that acted like a two way channel. He was aware that the creatures could see into his mind and hear his thoughts and he was also able to see into their mind and hear their thoughts but because their minds were so different, it would cause severe migraines and be nearly impossible to decipher.

When using hypnotic regression, Scott was able to remember an incident of an alien abduction that he would refer to as a "biggie" that had occurred when he was around ten years old. As Scott was sleeping in his room, he awoke to a strange humming sound and saw what he described as a huge flying saucer hovering outside his bedroom, visible from his bedroom window. As he was staring at the flying saucer, a group of the small humanoid beings entered his room through the hallway. The family dog, that had been barking and growling at the creatures, was immediately knocked out and put to sleep when one of the creatures waved a rod in the dog's direction, causing it to fall asleep in the hallway at their feet.

As the creatures filed into Scott's room, they waved the rod over him, causing him to suddenly enter into an almost dreamlike state of consciousness. Once they were done, the creatures started filing out of the room and heading upstairs to Scott's parents room. Fearing that the creatures were going to hurt his parents, Scott ran upstairs but noticed that the creatures had already disappeared, and ran into his parent's room where he told them that aliens had entered his room and were coming to kill them.

The parents, having heard impossible to explain noises only moments prior, got up and grabbed their two kids as Henry, Scott's father, grabbed his gun and ran outside the house to shoot at the flying saucer. By the time Henry got outside, however, the craft had already disappeared and the creatures were nowhere to be seen. Curious as to the truth surrounding the event, Scott's psychiatrist connected Scott's parents and asked them if they remembered the event as he described. Emily, Scott's mother, would not only write back that she remembered the event, but that she believed that the alien abductions had occurred and were not fabrications.

Emily would later write the following paragraph in her letter:

"It's bewildering that this was all happening right under our eyes so to speak and we apparently we were not aware of it – consciously at any rate – and to recall Scott's remarks referring to fear of seeing them in his room – flying saucer outside – dog put to sleep – running up to our room – Henry going outside to see what was out there with his gun. We do recall this, but [it] was at the very back of our memory until this all came up a couple of years ago when Scott said, 'Remember when I was a kid?' and we said, 'Oh yeah!'

The last abduction scenario that Scott was able to remember had occurred to him only three years prior to him seeking professional help. Scott would consider this event the catalyst that was so traumatic it was most likely what triggered his memories of all of his past experiences to come to the surface. After a series of hypnotic regressions, Scott was able to describe the event in vivid detail.

According to Scott, it was some time in April of 1990 that as he was getting ready for bed, he felt a sudden intense feeling of anxiety come over him. In order to try to calm down, Scott grabbed a nearby magazine and was flipping through the pages reading when he started to feel his mind open up as if a two way communication channel had emerged within him. He would later describe the feeling as if he knew that the extraterrestrial beings were suddenly there inside his mind. Fearing that they would soon invade his room, Scott would begin to panic and attempt to leave the area before soon realising that he did not appear to be in control of his body. Looking over at his bedroom door, he remarked that it was as if the door vanished into thin air as he could see the reflections of an unexplainable light bouncing off the wall coming from the inside of a nearby room.

As he continued staring at the doorway, Scott described six of the extraterrestrial creatures that entered, claiming that their bodies looked boxy and their heads were strangely angular and triangular. It was at this point that one of the creatures pushed a round tipped rod in Scott's direction, causing him to instantly become anaesthetised from any feelings of pain or discomfort but still conscious of the entire encounter. As the creatures were touching him with the rod behind his ear, causing him to no longer be able to move an inch of his body, he claimed to feel a buzzing coming from the inside of his right ear that slowly grew into a ringing sound. Scott then described his vision as appearing to have been similar to a TV monitor that was lagging, only capturing frames and glitches of vision at a time.

Scott would then describe the feeling in his head as if he was battling to prevent the creatures from being able to touch his mind and peer into his memories and thoughts, but before he could successfully ward off the mental invasion, he fell unconscious.

When Scott finally came to, he found himself strapped down onto a metal table surrounded by two humanoid figures that appeared to have been doctor like in appearance, wearing strange glasses on their face, white coats with off tan and white tinted skin. Surrounding the doctor like entities, Scott claimed to have seen several shooter beings in what he believed were army like suits. These creatures were described as having deep black and slightly slanted eyes with grey borders at the edges of their eyes. Panicked by the sight, Scott asked the creatures who or what they were but they refused to answer and instead replied with a question in Scott's mind stating that they were curious as to what Scott was.

It was after this short exchange that the creatures placed a faucet-like device onto Scott's penis, with a suction-like device being attached to the tip of his penis. According to Scott, the device appeared to have been connected to a box located at the side of a surgical table via a plastic tube. As he tried to fight against the creatures, he could see a reflection of himself hovering above him as if he was staring into a large mirror. He then noticed in the reflection that his head was resting on a block-like pillow and four metal surgical prongs were being pressed into his neck, high up, just slightly below his scalp. Although uncertain as to what the metal prongs were accomplishing, Scott assumed that the prongs were actually some form of electrodes that were planted at the base of his skull to manipulate him and control his movements and feelings.

Shortly after looking into his reflection, the creatures would soon turn on the device wrapped around Scott's genitals and begin extracting copious amounts of semen. The forceful extraction of Scott's semen, however, caused terrible pain as he began questioning why the creatures were abusing him. It was at this point that the beings began to communicate telepathically with Scott and telling him that they were going to use his sperm for experiments. Unsure of what they meant, they clarified to Scott telling him that they were going to use him as a father so that they could make babies with Scott's genetic material for future purposes, though failed to elaborate what those purposes could be. Shortly thereafter, Scott would pass out from the pain and awake in his room the next morning with several bruises and pins in his body that appeared similar to shots and surgical marks.

Oddly enough, when Scott started to attend the routine hypnotic sessions, Scott's sister, Lee, also chose to attend a session of her own as she believed that she had suffered from sexual abuse in the past by these impossible to explain creatures. Unfortunately, any information surrounding Scott's sister is unknown, though Scott believes that his sister and possibly his mother had suffered from alien abduction events in the past but are unaware of their experiences similar to how he had been before opening his mental block.

Although it's impossible to know for certain, Scott believes that the extraterrestrial creatures were planning on using harvested sperm to create human alien hybrid creatures that could one day take over the planet and have the genetic composition and health necessary to adapt to our planet's climate.

The Alien Abduction Of The Palmer Boys

One of the most bizarre multiple disappearances was originally recorded back in June of 1999, near Wasilla, Alaska and features the isolated disappearances of two brothers within the same area, at different dates. The first disappearance was recorded back on the 4th of June, 1999, when a fifteen year old boy named Michael Timothy Palmer went missing after riding his bike near the edge of Alaskan wilderness after heading home sometime around four in the morning. According to Michael's mother, Lisa Palmer, Michael has been hanging out with his friends at an after graduation party nine miles from his home. The official reports describe that on the third of June, 1999, Michael palmer took a ride with a friend to the graduation party and stayed there for several hours before deciding to head home at around 3:30 in the morning. Michael and his group of friends decided to ride bicycles back home on a nine mile journey, and so Michael was provided with his own bike from a friend so the group could all ride together.

The group of friends would later claim that as the group was riding together, Michael, unfamiliar with the bike, was often left at the end of their travelling line, and fell behind the group several times. As the group crossed Pittman Road, an area that parallels next to the Wasilla Little Susitna River, they suddenly noticed that Michael was no longer with the group. Immediately, the boys pulled over to the side of the road, outside of a 7-Eleven, located on the Parks Highway, to wait for Michael to catch up to them. After standing around and talking for awhile, the group of boys debated on whether they should look for Michael and retrace their steps, however, given the fact that it was almost four in the morning, and the majority of the boys were cold and tired, they debated on whether or not it was necessary to search for Michael given the fact that the roads they were taking were familiar to the group and that Michael should have had no trouble finding his way home. After the group accepted that Michael most likely took another road home after getting left behind too many times, the boys continued home and decided they would call Michael in the morning to make sure he was okay.

At around eleven in the morning, Michael's mother, Lisa Palmer, was getting ready for work at the Providence Hospital when she started to get worried that Michael had not yet called her or showed up at the house. Nervous that Michael was up to no good, as the graduation party was his first ever high school party that he had attended, Lisa Palmer called the house where the graduation party had occurred to ask about Michael but was told that Michael had ridden home on a bike something around three to four in the morning with his group of friends. Now believing that Michael was staying with one of his friends, Lisa called several of his friends who then told Michael's mother about the incident of him suddenly disappearing and that they all had assumed he had taken another street home.

Michael's mother then immediately called local law enforcement to report her son as missing and telling them everything the group of boys had told her. At this point in the investigation, law enforcement believed that Michael's disappearance would have been impossible unless he had been attacked or the victim of a purposeful malicious act. By 3:00 PM, the Alaska state troopers were contacted and a formal investigation into the disappearance of Michael Palmer was underway.

Without a moment's hesitation, the state troopers rounded up all of the boys that had last seen Michael Palmer and questioned them for several hours, while separated, as they were under the suspicion that the group of friends had attacked Michael or an accident had occurred that they were attempting to cover up out of fear of legal consequences. After several hours of intense interrogation, with the boys being subjected to polygraph tests, the State Troopers uncovered no new evidence, with the boys seemingly cleared of any wrongdoing.

The Alaska State Troopers then believed that perhaps Michael's father had been involved with the disappearance in some way, as Michael's mother, Lisa, had already been separated and remarried around this time, and the father was a less active factor in Michael's life. Michaels older brother, Chuckie, then called his father Charles Palmer, to let the father know about Michael's disappearance and if he knew anything about Michael's whereabouts. It was then discovered that Michael's father, Charles Palmer, had been out on a fishing boat for several days, far away from the town and unable to have been anywhere near the area at the time of the disappearance.

Back at square one, with next to no leads, the investigators combed over Pittman Road and the surrounding Little Susitna River for any sign of Michael and discovered a bizarre scene. According to the Alaska State Troopers, the bike that Michael had been riding was discovered several hundred yards away from Pittman Road, at the bottom of a small creek bed within the Little Susitna River. Given that fact that the Little Susitna River was not a large river, they sent a diver team in the area to follow the small creek bed and look at the bed of the river for any sign of Michael Palmer's belongings but were unable to find anything except the bicycle sticking out of the water in plain sight as if it had been purposefully left in the river bed.

Using the bicycle as a point for a straight line from where Michael Palmer had last been seen, the Alaska State troopers continued searching throughout the area and located a pair of shoes that were the same brand and size that Michael Palmer had worn on the morning of his disappearance. According to the reports, the shoes were located roughly two hundred yards from where the bicycle had been found. After inspecting the Converse Tennis shoes, the investigators described the shoes as having been wet and filled with small deposits of silt inside that appeared to match the riverbed silt nearby. Now believing that Michael Palmer had fallen into the river and walked out of the water, dripping wet and cold, they realised that finding Michael would be a life or death situation given the high chance of Michael succumbing to hypothermia. What appears to be most peculiar, however, is that Michael's shoes appeared to have been perfectly placed side by side, as if Michael had taken off his shoes and placed them next to each other on the grass purposefully before continuing walking away from the river. The investigators remarked that one of the shoes had been untied but the other shoe had still been tied, as if the shoe had been kicked off without untying the laces and then placed upright and ajcadent to the other shoe on the ground.

Unfortunately, no other sign of Michael Palmer had been uncovered, with State Troopers believing that Michael could have been the victim of an abduction as his shoes had been found next to the Valley Flying Crown Airport, a small private field located next to Pittman Road and dense woodlands more than seventy miles long that connected with the nearby Bald Mountain. Investigators had a hard time explaining why Michael would seemingly take off his shoes if he was to continue walking in the direction of the woods, opposite of the direction of his home.

Oddly enough, the disappearance of Michael Palmer would not be the only sudden disappearance to have plagued the Palmer family, as Michael's older brother, Chuckie Palmer would turn up missing roughly eleven years later on the tenth of April, 2010.

Eleven years following the Palmer son's disappearance, the family would be visiting the Bald Mountain wilderness area, roughly seventy miles away from where Michael Palmer had disappeared, for a small family camping trip. Despite the fact that the family was more than seventy miles away from Michael's last known location, the woodlands connected to where they were camping were the same woods Michael had last been seen nearby. According to the report, on the ninth of April, during a casual Saturday afternoon, Chuckie and the Palmer family were together riding their snowmobiles around the hills of Bald Mountain, located near Mastodon Road. Staying within a five mile radius of their cabin, 30 year old Chuckie had been at the end of the line of snowmobiles that the family had been riding, consistently falling behind for some unknown reason as the group was travelling home.

After a few minutes, similar to Michael's Disappearance, four family members and some friends noticed that Chuckie was no longer following behind. Remembering what had happened to Michael, the majority of the family members turned around to go looking for Chuckie as soon as they noticed he had disappeared whereas the rest of the group returned back to the cabin, believing that he would show up shortly. Once the majority of the group reached the cabin, however, fresh snow started to fall and after an hour of waiting with no sign of Chuckie, the group began to worry that the snow would cover his tracks.

At around 7:15 AM the following day, after spending time looking for Chuckie on their own, the Alaska State Troopers were called out to the area to begin a formal search for Chuckie who had now been deemed missing. Immediately, State Troopers had gone to the area where Chuckie had last been seen and spread out in even searching grid patterns, following pathways in the hopes that Chuckie had merely travelled down the road wrong when returning to the cabin. Although puzzling, investigators later pieced together that rather than continuing the straight path back to the cabin, Chuckie had taken a turn that led eastward to the eastern side of Bald Mountain. Following this eastern path, the investigators found Chuckies snowmobile stuck deep in the snow, roughly twelve miles past the cabin on the wrong side of the mountain, with no sign of Chuckie anywhere nearby.

After spending several hours attempting to look for Chuckie, a heavy snowstorm fell in the area, blanketing their paths, making search and rescue difficult for the troopers. After some time, the rescue efforts were postponed until conditions improved. By the following Monday, roughly twenty four hours later, the Talkeetna fire department, Alaska state troopers, several dozen volunteers, and two helicopters conducted a thorough search of the surrounding area but were unable to find any signs of Chuckie or his equipment. By the following week, the search for Chuckie had dwindled to a stand still, and to this day, no one knows where he could have disappeared to.

Although some rescuers believed that Chuckie had made a purposeful attempt on his life, the family and friends swear that Chuckie was in a positive mindset and had never suffered from any forms of depression or thoughts of self harm. Even more peculiar, when the Talkeetna fire department chief was interviewed almost a year later surrounding the incident, on the 4th of May, 2011, he had made the comment to the KTNA that he believed a far more terrible conspiracy was responsible for Chuckies disappearance. Fire Chief Ken Farina who had been in the area and involved in the search and rescue of Chuckie and had known about his younger brother's bizarre disappearance claimed that he spent four days out in the Bald Mountain wilderness and found evidence that supports the theory that Chuckie had been abducted by extraterrestrials. No evidence was provided by Chief Ken Farina though he has gone on record several times saying "I stand by my original alien abduction theory because I cannot come up with any other explanation."

Chuckie would leave behind a wife and three daughters. To this day, no evidence of belongings has been uncovered surrounding the two Palmer Brothers and their strange disappearances.

The Abduction Of Ed & Lynn Baxter

Back in July of 1961, a young man by the name of Ed, claimed to have been the victim of a series of alien abduction events that directly influenced his personal philosophies, career path and his way of life. According to Ed, since he was four years old, he had suffered from terrible routine night terrors but was often unable to remember what he had been dreaming about when he would wake up from them. These troubling nightmares would eventually manifest themselves in bizarre ways and lead to a series of eccentric behaviours that Ed would play out that would negatively affect his life. Ed would later explain that for some unknown reason, he believed that due to his night terrors, he had developed a terrible fear of medicine, hospitals, doctors and anything to do with surgeries or healthcare, despite the fact that he never had any negative experiences with healthcare or healthcare professionals.

By his teenage years, Ed claimed that he suffered from sudden onset crippling anxiety attacks that would cause him to sweat, shake and feel an impending sense of doom while performing common everyday activities with seemingly no real cause behind them. According to Ed, it was not until he met his wife Lynn that he felt that his life was slowly falling into place as he believed that he had always known her somehow, a sentiment that Lynn also believed as she felt that when she first met Ed, she claimed to have had known him for a long time. After finishing school, Ed went to work for a high tech firm in Massachusetts for engineering and computer technologies.

Now believing that his life was finally falling into place, Ed began to spend more time focusing on his mental health, taking up classes in meditation to eventually find a way to cure his sudden onset anxiety attacks. Although the meditation classes would eventually help to clear up the panic attacks, the unforeseen consequences of the meditations would reveal to Ed a series of terrifying memories he had repressed from a young age.

According to Ed, it was one day in the summer of 1989, while walking along a cliffside path that overlooked a rocky shore, he experienced one of the worst panic attacks he had ever felt. Lynn would later describe the event, claiming that Ed's body became rigid and tense, as he appeared to have instantly become withdrawn. Within a few seconds of this change, Ed broke into a sweat and tightly gripped Lynn's hands with a look of terror in his eyes. At that moment, Ed claimed to have remembered that he had been the victim of alien abduction over the course of his entire youth.

The first abduction event that Ed could remember occurred back in July of 1961 when he and a friend, another boy the same age as Ed at the time, named Bob Baxter, were visiting a cliffside vacation spot that overlooked a rocky shore somewhere out near the east coast of Maine, north of Portland. The boys and their parents were driving in a large vehicle owned by the Baxters, when the weather became too difficult to safely navigate through. Ed described the weather as having been almost supernaturally damp and foggy, forcing the two families to park at the side of the road roughly a few hundred yards from the cliff. Given the fact that it was already almost the middle of the night, the families decided to use the time waiting for the weather to clear to take a nap. Soon thereafter, everyone got ready to sleep as they believed the weather most likely would not clear until morning.

As Ed fell asleep, however, he remembered waking up and finding himself floating over the rocky shores, past the cliff, suspended in a small pod that had a glass bubble over the top of it with small transparent curved walls that allowed him to see down into the foamy waves below. As he was standing in the pod, he started to hear what he described as wind buffeting around outside and the soft tunes of light classical music coming from nearby houses and soon noticed that he was completely naked and standing next to an odd looking female figure.

Ed described the female figure as appearing humanoid but not quite human. On the creature's head were long, thin, wires of silver blond hair that came down to slightly below her upper back. its eyes were described as being large and almost completely blackened, with the size of the eyes made more exaggerated by the smallness of the creature's mouth and nose. The creature's head was also described as being horrifyingly irregular, with its forehead being much larger than a normal human's forehead and its upper cranium and chin forming into a sort of triangular shape.

According to Ed, at first he felt horrified and disgusted by the creature but as it stared into his eyes, he felt it slowly become attractive and beautiful. As he continued staring at the creature, Ed claimed that he became increasingly aroused by the creature and started to feel self conscious in his nakedness. Almost sensing his inner thoughts, the strange female figure provided Ed with a small blanket or large towel that he can wrap himself in. After wrapping himself up, however, Ed claimed that the creature advanced onto him and they performed sexual acts with each other, including typical human insertion.

After reaching a climax with the creature, Ed believed that he entered a strange mental space where he was then being telepathically communicated with by the creature, telling him about the nature of the universe and the political, social and economic problems of the human world. According to Ed, the female figure claimed that the human race was on a pathway to destruction and that human beings were hurting the world in their destructive path and that it was important for Ed to go into science and technology as a field of study to help change the course of the world. Shortly after the female figure told him about the potential destructive future of the Earth, Ed felt his entire psyche begin to change as if his mind was being reformed by the thoughts of the strange creature.

After the visions and the conversation with the creature was over, he was then told by the female humanoid that there are two separate types of aliens, a group referred to as negative types and her group which are positive types. The negative types want to see human beings fail whereas positive types want the humans to succeed. The alien then communicated telepathically that she was joined by a supporting staff of other humanoid creatures and that they would prevent the negative type of aliens from abducting him in the future as had occurred when he was much younger.

Before the conversation had ended completely, the creature then told Ed that she was planning on using his sperm to create what she described as "special babies" that would be used to help the people of Earth. Although Ed was unsure what she meant by it, he assumed that she was planning on making a humanoid hybrid between himself and the female figure that would be able to look and act like humans on Earth to help blend into society and slowly manipulate the political, social and economic beliefs of the world.

After remembering this impossible to explain encounter, Ed and his wife Lynn would attempt to remember more past abduction events, going so far as having Ed talk with hypnotist specialists to help bring out more of his past abduction events prior to his teenage years. After spending several years with hypnotists and joining several alien abduction support groups, Ed was unable to bring forward any of his past experiences and instead assumed that perhaps those memories were locked away from him to protect him from their damage. To this day, Ed no longer claims to suffer from sudden onset anxiety attacks and believes that he has finally overcome his fear of healthcare settings and healthcare professionals.

The Past Abductions Of Sheila N. & Her Mother

Choosing to remain anonymous, a forty four year old woman named Sheila, last initial N., was working as a social worker for a hospital when her mother unexpectedly passed away due to unknown circumstances. Back in 1979, Sheila's mother had suffered a massive heart attack but would make a full recovery only a few weeks later. Worried about the future of her heart health, Sheila urged her mother to take better care of herself and so Sheila's mother would begin to take routine check ups at the hospital that Sheila worked at to ensure her daughter that she was perfectly fine. Five years following the heart attack, however, when going to the hospital for a routine check up in 1984, it became apparent that Sheila's mother would need to be hospitalised for an endarterectomy, a typical and common surgical procedure that would help to clear up minor coronary artery blockage and restoring optimal blood flow.

Not wanting to take a risk with her past heart problems, Sheila's mother scheduled for the surgery and was prepared for the procedure within a couple of weeks of her diagnosis. Oddly enough, for some unknown reason, while Sheila's mother was undergoing the surgery, she suffered a sudden massive cerebral haemorrhage forcing the surgery to end prematurely. Within seven days of her hospitalisation, Sheila's mother would pass away from complications caused by the sudden brain bleed.

Due to feelings of guilt and confusion, Sheila N. responded to the death of her mother with intense grief. She would later file a complaint with the hospital, claiming that the doctors performed negligent actions that would lead to her mother's death during the surgery as it did not make sense as to how a cerebral haemorrhage could have occurred during a routine artery surgery. Sheila would also claim that the hospital would perform actions that were demeaning of her mother's body while she was injured and sustained on life support, though reports fail to make clear what these claims specifically were about.

Four weeks following her mother's funeral, Sheila started spending her nights wandering through her small town, or sometimes taking time to travel out to remote locations to help with her grieving process. As she started to feel as if she were getting better and slowly coming to accept her mother's passing, however, she claimed to have started to suffer from impossible to explain electric dreams that would often leave her suffering from terrible night terrors that she was unable to remember during her waking hours. Even more strange, she started noticing and writing down in her personal journal about all of the strange planes that she was seeing in the night sky as she would wander and isolate herself in strange remote locations. On the ninth of February back in 1984, she would write about these mysterious planes saying that it appeared as if there were "more planes in the sky than there are cars in the area."

Even more peculiar, however, were the nature of her sudden electric dreams after having witnessed these strange planes in the sky. According to Sheila, she would have recurring dreams of being unable to move and her entire body would feel as if it were numb and vibrating as if it were full of electricity. Although she was aware of the fact that there were elements of her dreams she was unable to remember, she felt as if these nightmares were spiritual in some unknown way. Later referring to the electric dreams as spiritual dreams, Sheila would describe the night terrors saying that it felt as if she were being possessed by demons, as they made her feel like someone or something else was shaking and controlling her body.

After a few more weeks of suffering from the electrical dreams a few times a week, she started to believe that perhaps the dreams were some form of complex seizure caused by her stresses and grief over her mother. Without hesitation, Sheila started to visit with a hospital psychiatrist in the hopes of getting medication for her possible seizure disorder and to discuss with the psychiatrist about her strong emotions surrounding her mothers passing. Unfortunately for Sheila, the adding psychiatric help would only exacerbate her electrical dreams even further.

According to Sheila, sometime in March 1984, roughly ten weeks after her mother's passing, she would experience one of her electric dreams, but this time she could remember the entirety of the event with total clarity. Sheila would later explain that typical dreams she experienced appeared to have been more random and fragmented, but her experience with the electric dream seemed far more natural with a natural progression towards a certain direction. She would describe the event in her journal with the following paragraph:

"[I went to sleep but the vibratory feelings returned, then] I woke up to a very loud noise with flashing lights. The noise was a high pitch sound and remained at that tone for the duration [of the experience]. I was struck by the precision of the red flashing lights. Other bedroom doors and the bathroom door were open. I could see down the length of the hall and it appeared that the lights were coming through the windows on all sides of the house at the same time. At this point in time I was lying on my back. I was very frightened. I eventually raised myself up on my elbows. I saw several, small, people-like things walking down the right side of the hall, one behind the other. They looked like their whole bodies were silver in colour. I noticed some blue on the first one in line below his right shoulder. It appeared to be a reflection of something, although there is nothing blue in the hall. They were short with thin arms and legs. As they approached the bedroom, the third or fourth one in the line raised his right hand up. I knew they were coming to me, but I had never seen them before. They appeared to be waddling [later this proved to be an artefact of the flashing light pattern]. They were very awkward on their feet [also related to the flashing lights]."

Shortly after spotting the strange humanoid creatures waddling towards her, Sheila would pass out from terror and wake up several hours later to see that all of the doors and windows to her home were left completely opened. Due to her bizarre night terrors and increasingly deteriorating mental health, Sheila and her husband became estranged, with the couple choosing to sleep in separate rooms as Sheila felt that by sleeping in another room, it would be the only way for her to protect her husband from the strange creatures attempting to visit her.

Despite going to a psychiatrist and attempting to talk with her religious leader about what she was experiencing, Sheila felt as if the events and supernatural experiences were worsening as time went on. Feeling as if she were stuck in a situation with no way out, Sheila would make an attempt on her life roughly one year after her mother's passing. Oddly enough, despite swallowing a bottle of Aspirin, Sheila suffered no negative side effects or damage to her stomach lining.

It would not be for another five years after her mother's passing that Sheila would begin to treat her visions of the strange humanoid creatures with sincerity after a particularly terrifying and unexplainable event would occur to her while she was visiting with her daughter on New Year's Eve of 1989. According to Sheila, while her daughter and son in law were sleeping upstairs, she suddenly heard a loud noise similar to the first experience she encountered ten weeks after her mothers passing. Fearing that the creatures were coming back, she sat up to get out of the room but soon felt her entire body feeling as if it were full of electricity and forced her down into the bed. Before she could see the small people-like things enter the room, as she referred to them as, she would pass out and fail to remember what happened next.

It was at this point, however, that Sheila started to seriously entertain the idea that real physical creatures were visiting her at night given the lucidity of the event and the fact that she knew that she had not fallen asleep prior to the event occurring. She would later write to her psychiatrist the following letter:

“Prior to January 1, 1990, I thought all of those ‘whatevers’ entering my bedroom were only symbols in a dream. Since that time, I have come to recognize the hostility and aggression I experienced with it as a connection to the recurring ‘spiritual dreams.’ In my dream, those ‘whatevers’ meant business, and so do I.”

Hoping to uncover proof as to her experiences, Sheila began recording in detail the events that she would witness and started looking into her mother's life after she stumbled across an article in the local newspaper that detailed bizarre sightings of unidentified flying objects over her mothers home before her passing. It would be during the summer of 1990 that Sheila, with the recommendation of her psychiatrist, would contact another psychiatrist by the name of Dr. Fred Frankel, who worked at the Harvard Medical School and specialised in the therapeutic use of hypnosis.

Although Sheila's psychiatrist was hoping that the use of hypnosis would allow her to explore the cause of her mental illness in an objective manner and possibly find relief from her stresses and anxieties, the truth would be far from the case. According to Dr. Fred Frankel, after doing a careful workup of Sheila's neurological health and performing an all-night sleep study, he would perform several hypnosis sessions where he would bring forward several of her repressed dreams into vivid detail. Another practising hypnosis psychiatrist who wished to stay anonymous wrote that in one of Sheila's hypnosis sessions, she claimed that quote "she is sitting on her bed and sees several little figures: the first one stood at the foot of her bed and the second one by the door. They walked in an awkward way and had the shape of a small humanoid body. [In another dream] She is lying down with a blanket over her and saw two of these small beings standing over her."

Unable to explain her bizarre dreams, the psychiatrists would dismiss Sheila's visions as nothing more than complex seizures possibly caused by an injury to her head from high school and made worse due to an underlying post traumatic stress disorder caused by her mother's passing. After spending another two years with the doctors, Sheila continued to suffer from visitations of small humanoid creatures and was unable to make any progress towards the betterment of her mental health. By the summer of 1992, Sheila would cut all ties with her psychiatrists and come into contact with a psychologist who specialised in alien abduction cases in the hopes of better understanding her situation.

It was at around this time that Sheila would join several support groups for alien abduction victims who shared similar stories despite having been isolated from each other their entire lives, including details such as similar flashing lights, similar colored lights and similar humanoid creatures entering their homes or taking them someplace unrecognisable. Oftentimes, during these sessions with other alien abduction victims, Sheila would question other abduction victims to find further similarities between their story and hers, and would eventually become fixated on another woman by the name of Julia who appeared to have almost identical experiences as Sheila.

It was also at around this time that Sheila started going to hypnosis sessions with the psychologist that specialises in alien abductions to bring out more details surrounding her past abduction cases. According to her psychologist, she was able to unlock a series of increasingly bizarre abductions that had occurred before she was six years old and up until her teenage years, several years prior to the supposed head injury theorised by her previous psychiatrists. The oldest memory Sheila uncovered was the witnessing of something she called "The Gaw". According to Sheila, sometime around her fifth birthday, she and her brother were outside their small home when they witnessed a strange light in the sky. Shortly after this vision, as she and her brother were sleeping in the same room, they both witnessed a strange humanoid figure they called "The Gaw" and would have the same appearance as the creature that would visit her again, back in 1984, ten weeks following her mother's passing.

Over the next few years, between the ages of six and eight, Sheil would claim to witness creatures walking out of her closet, into her bedroom and then disappearing back into her closet again in the night. One night, after regaining control over her body, she screamed when she saw one of the humanoid creatures exit from her closet, causing the creature to disappear back inside the closet as her parents came into the room to check on her. As her parents attempted to reassure Sheila that she had experienced nothing more than a nightmare, she felt that the sighting had occurred too many times to have been a dream and so held reservations on the sighting.

Another sighting she would recall during hypnosis would occur to her during her early teens. Sheila claimed that as she and her mother with a couple of her siblings were driving in one of the family cars following behind their father who was driving with three more siblings, both cars suddenly came to a stop as they witnessed a bright light descend from the sky that looked liked like a bolt of lightning that rested above and parallel to the horizon. After a few seconds, the light suddenly disappeared and the parents slowly resumed the drive. The entire family was confused by the sighting at the time but merely dismissed it as a rare atmospheric phenomenon. Hoping to confirm this new memory, Sheila would visit with her sister Melissa to talk about the strange bright light event.

Oddly enough, as Sheila would recall the event, Melissa would nod along and say that remembers the sighting as well but then would press Sheila for more details as to why she was wanting to talk about the bizarre event. Unsure of what to tell Melissa, Sheila opened up about her terrifying abduction experiences and started to tell Melissa everything that she was experiencing. Bizarrely, Melissa reacted to Sheila's experiences with relief and empathy as she then revealed to Sheila that she was suffering from very similar experiences over the course of her entire life, but that he visits were not as frequent and would span over the course of several years.

Melissa would then tell Sheila about her oldest experience that would occur sometime around her seventh or eighth birthday. According to Melissa, while she was outside of her mother's home, she saw something that she described as massive and silver suddenly floating in the sky above her. As she stared up at the strange floating craft, it suddenly vanished as soon as it appeared. Melissa became so disturbed by the sight that she ran to her parents shaking and crying. Her parents, unsure of what she was saying, dismissed her sighting as nothing more than a blimp that must have been passing overhead. Melissa would also confide in Sheila that she had also been visiting with hypnotists over the years and was able to remember an event of a flying craft blinking blue and orangish pink colours.

Additionally, during her early twenties, Melissa claims that she had seen what she described as a "ball of light" come through the closed sliding doors of her apartment, bounce around the room as if it were reflecting off of surfaces and then travelled down a nearby hallway into another room and disappeared after passing through a wall. At the time of the ball of light sighting, she had been in her room with a close friend and initially, when they saw the light, they ignored its erratic movements believing that it must have been a reflecting light from a passing car outside. After the light disappeared, however, it dawned on Melissa and her friend that the curtains were closed and the light travelled in such a way to have been impossible for a reflection to have been the source of the light. Quickly, the girls followed the light as it travelled into another room and watched it bounce around a few times before it exited the house through the same sliding doors it used to enter.

Several years after discovering her sister Melissa was suffering from these bizarre experiences, Sheila would learn that one of her cousins would also claim to have suffered from strange sightings. Her cousin would later claim that she witnessed a hovering UFO in her and her neighbours backyard and that she had experienced loud humming noises and impossible to explain flashing lights similar to Sheila's abduction experiences.

Oddly enough, as Sheila continued looking into the familial connection with these alien abduction experiences, she started to theorise that perhaps the abduction phenomenon had also occurred with her mother decades prior to her death. After researching and asking other members of the family, Sheila soon uncovered that these impossible to explain experiences of unidentified flying objects, flashing louds, loud humming and sightings of humanoid creatures had been occurring in her family for several generations. It was also around this time that Sheila learned of her own daughter's experiences.

According to Sheila's daughter, though she does not remember seeing humanoid creatures, she claims to have also witnessed flashing lights invading her homes and loud humming sounds in the night shortly before she would fall asleep. Additionally, Sheila herself remembered a supernatural event that had occurred with her daughter, Beverly, when she was around fourteen to fifteen months old. According to Sheila, while Beverly was sleeping in her crib, Sheila remembers waking up suddenly in the middle of the night after hearing a noise that sounded like walking through the house. As she went downstairs to check on Beverly in the dark, she claimed to have seen something white across the stairs. Unsure of what the white object was, she turned on the light and saw that it was Beverly, fast asleep on the stairs still in her pyjamas without a blanket. Sheila was unable to explain how Beverly got out of her crib and left her room while still sound asleep.

Although Sheila's uncertain of why she and her family appear to be suffering from these routine extraterrestrial visitations, she believes that her family was chosen as a form of extraterrestrial study with the belief that her family will continue to be studied over the course of several generations. Sheila would later state that one of her oldest memories of the abductions was an event that she would claim is evidence of invasive surgical procedures being conducted on ehr and her family. Sheila would describe the event as seeing a strange drill being dug into her arm that had split it open and implanted a small device, possibly used to track her when she was just a teenager.

Sheila also believes that the invading humanoid creatures have some kind of message for her and her family, and not a very positive one. Sheila feels that the beings are trying to tell her that she and her family might be special and so her descendants will continue to be plagued by these impossible to explain events, in an experiment to alter their evolution and their development. Even more bizarre, Sheila believes the aliens are trying to tell her that her family is not alone in these experiences and that many other groups of people are also being tampered with by alien life for unknown purposes.

The Nightmares Of Jerry & Her Brother Ken

A young housewife from Kansas City, Missouri, who chooses to go by the anonymous name of Jerry, claims to have suffered from alien abduction events that have plagued her since she was only seven years old. Originally believing that her experiences of impossible to explain sightings of flying saucers outside of her bedroom and strange humanoid shaped creatures entering her home were nothing more than nightmares, it was not until she saw a made for TV miniseries talking about alien abductions that she started to realise that her experiences directly matched with those of known alien abductees. Hoping to better understand her condition, Jerry contacted a known alien specialist who would help to conduct hypnosis regression experiments to bring her hazy memories into full clarity.

During the month of June, back in 1992, Jerry, who described herself as an ordinary housewife, would get into contact with a professional psychiatrist who specialised in alien abduction reports and would begin to open up about her strange experiences. During her first session with the hypnosis expert, Jerry would share with the researcher her personal journal in which she detailed written descriptions of her alien abduction experiences and personal philosophies that she claimed that she was learning during what she referred to as her "transformative" process with the extraterrestrial beings.

Oddly enough, due to familial issues growing up, Jerry had only received an education up until the ninth grade, when she dropped out of high school due to personal reasons. Despite the lack of education, however, Jerry's journal was filled with sophisticated and well-articulated ideas that oftentimes used complex words that Jerry was unable to explain herself but were written in their correct usage. Jerry would tell her psychiatrist that she believed that the words were coming to her via an extraterrestrial intelligence and that given her lack of understanding of the words or phrases, it was obvious that something outside of herself was providing her with the inspiration.

According to Jerry, these impossible to explain alien abduction experiences have been happening over the course of her entire life and number too many to count. Although her mother would often discount her experiences as nothing more than nightmares, very early on, Jerry noticed the appearance of scoop marks, scars, bruises and small lesions that would match her abduction experiences and prove that something physical had occurred. Jerry's first alien abduction event that she could remember in vivid detail first occurred when she was only seven years old and still living within Kansas City, Missouri.

As she was getting ready to sleep, Jerry noticed what she described as a sort of unusual light, a spaceship and small thin grey beings standing outside her bedroom window. At first, being young and naive to what the creatures were, Jerry claimed that she was not afraid of the strange humanoid beings when she first saw them. In fact, Jerry described the creatures as appearing to be cute, and that seeing the creatures outside her window made her really happy as they telepathically encouraged her to come outside and play with them.

According to Jerry, during the event, she described the house as being unusually quiet as if every other member of her household had disappeared. Although she reported feeling a sense of anxiety, she claimed that invading feelings from the creatures outside of her window would help to calm her down and reassure her that everything would be okay. As she continued looking out the window, a bright light suddenly filled the room. Unsure of its source, Jerry then had a random thought pop into her mind that told that she shouldn't be afraid of the strange creatures because she knows them and they're not strangers. Despite this reassuring thought, however, Jerry's anxiety continued to grow as she felt compelled to come out of her bedroom and into the hallway leading into the living room.

Yet, rather than leave her room and follow these sudden compelling urges, seven year old Jerry continued staring out in the direction of the light and claimed to have seen an estimated twenty or thirty small beings outside her window. At the sight of the creatures, the feelings of reassurance and positivity soon vanished causing Jerry to back away from the window and the light in terror. According to Jerry, once the strange humanoid creatures realised that she was no longer willing to come outside, they soon took control of her entire body, causing her to freeze in place and be unable to move away. It was at this moment that Jerry described the creatures inexplicably passing through the frame of the window and entering the room through the wall.

"I wouldn't go out, so they had to come in." She would say.

Jerry believes that the creatures had become impatient with her as they entered her room by force and picked her up from her crouched position and carried her through the closed window as she claimed a sudden feeling of intense pressure washed over her. As she exited the window, she then had the feeling of intense acceleration as if she were falling into the sky. As she accelerated upward, she described seeing the top of her house, the nearby trees and the ground below grow smaller and then disappear in the darkness. She would later describe the event in the following paragraph:

"It kind of took my breath away to go up so fast. There was a big thing above me that I was being taken up into. I was being forced to join them but I felt that I was somehow a participant in the process. I don't know how, though."

As Jerry was ascending, she suddenly noticed that next to her were two other extraterrestrial beings holding a small figure in their arms that was revealed to be Jerry's little brother, Mark. Jerry was worried that her brother would have been afraid and panicking but then realised that he appeared to have been completely asleep. Now coming to her senses at the sight of her brother being kidnapped, Jerry made the attempt to fight off the creatures and get out of their grip as they were floating but suddenly became paralyzed from the waist up and was unable to fight back any longer. Describing the feeling as a "tremendous vibration throughout her entire body" she was unable to stay conscious for much longer and soon passed out.

Although an indeterminate amount of time passed, Jerry felt like only a few minutes had elapsed as she awoke inside of a round room that went up into a dome-shaped ceiling. She described the room as being perfectly white with several levels to its design and railings at the edge of each level. At the top of the room, at one of the highest levels, Jerry claims to have seen people and machines. Shortly thereafter, Jerry and Mark were led to two curved tables in the room where the two were placed and strapped down on.

It was at this moment that Jerry claimed to see what she described as a "small, real dark" creature standing at the side of the railing on the level above them. The small dark creature was reportedly just watching Jerry and her brother as a taller lighter creature that she referred to as the "leader" appeared to be standing behind the dark creature, looking over the entire room. According to Jerry, the leader was described as being taller, older, wrinkly and tight with a nice face and a "permanent type of smile". The clothes of the creature were described as appearing similar to a one-piece suit decorated with goldish yellow designs, matching the Leader's stringy yellowing white hair. The hands of the taller lighter creature were also visible, appearing to be long and skinny, almost ending in clawlike tapering.

Shortly after looking at the Leader, Jerry claimed that a large sharp needle-like device from a high angle was inserted forcefully down into the side of her neck and started to leak fluid down her throat. Although she was uncertain if the fluid was blood, her own saliva or some other strange liquid, Jerry claimed that the leader would telepathically communicate with her and ask her if the medication had been quote "okay up till now." Unsure of what he meant, Jerry assumed that the creature was referring to some form of pain medication to help reduce the pain from her unknown procedure. After the needle was inserted into the neck, Jerry then claimed that another needle-like device was inserted into the side of her head and had reportedly implanted some unknown device into her brain or near her brain.

After the device was planted, Jerry claimed that she saw flashing lights and dots of red and yellow light and awoke in her room the next morning, though was unable to recall how she had ended up back in her bedroom in her bed.

This encounter with extraterrestrial creatures would not be her only remembered experience, however, as over the course of several more hypnosis sessions, Jerry would uncover several more memories of abduction events over the course of her life. According to another session, when Jerry was only nine years old, the family had decided to move to Georgia due to job opportunities and increasing problems with their current living situations. This would result in the family needing to stay at a motel for a few days as they were getting ready to move to Georgia. It was during these few days at a strange motel that Jerry would claim that as she was sleeping, she felt a presence in the room that she and her brother had been staying in.

Jerry would describe the presence as "a frightening sense" as she recalled a strange figure sitting at the edge of her bed, staring at her. Unable to remember anymore about the encounter, Jerry claims that the strange figure looked exactly like the small creatures that she remembers seeing standing outside of her bedroom window on the night she had been abducted and experimented on.

Over the next following years, Jerry would report suffering from a series of bizarre nightmares in which she would wake up in the middle of the night completely unable to move and seemingly paralyzed from head to toe. As she would lay in her bed, completely immobile, she would notice buzzing and ringing sounds that would slowly grow louder or change into whirring noises. As the sound would increase and become more difficult to describe, she would then see humanoid beings enter the room. As the creatures would surround her, she would fall back asleep and be unable to remember anything else about her nightmares. Despite sleeping through the night, Jerry would report waking up incredibly tired as if she had been awake all night and only received a couple hours of sleep at most. .

Another event that she would remember occurring sometime back in 1987, Jerry claimed that as she was in her room, she suddenly witnessed what she described as an invasion of glitter and sparkles into her room as if they had been thrown into the air from seemingly nowhere. As the glitter and sparkles enveloped the room, Jerry then saw two small beings wearing impossible to accurately describe shiny outfits or uniforms. According to Jerry, these two small humanoid beings then hovered above her bed and stared at her silently.

At the time of the event, Jerry was dating her husband, then fiance, Bob, and remembered that he was sleeping in the bed next to her. Hoping to wake him, Jerry let out an ear piercing scream but was unable to tell if she had actually screamed or if the sound had been in her head. As she turned to see Bob, she noticed that he was completely asleep and did not seem to be responsive in any way. As she turned back in the direction of the floating humanoid creatures, Jerry passed out and was unable to remember anything further about the event.

Another event a couple of years later, sometime during 1989, Jerry remembered being confronted by two feminine humanoid creatures that appeared to have been cloned twins. Although the twins did not speak aloud, Jerry claimed that they somehow telepathically communicated to her that they were her own hybrid offspring as a result of experimentation when she was younger. It would not be for another year that Jerry would experience a major abduction event that she considered to be one of the most traumatic experiences of her life.

Referred to as the 1990 incident, Jerry and Bob had just recently purchased a duplex apartment located in the city of Plymouth, located in the state of Massachusetts. Despite the fact that Jerry is unable to recall how the event began, while she was in the duplex apartment, she suddenly felt a presence in the room with her and felt a light tapping on her shoulder. Within the next moment, Jerry claimed that she had been abducted and taken into a large circular room that she described as metallic looking and shiny, with a series of tools and bizarre looking contraptions and equipment surrounding the edges of the room. As Jerry glanced around, she realised that she was being suspended in the air in a standing position while a series of experiments and procedures were being conducted on her. At one moment, Jerry remembers seeing her necklace coming off and falling to the floor as if suddenly affected by gravity when it was no longer around her neck.

Located near some of the equipment, Jerry then saw a tall being that she described as having blondish hair who appeared to be the leader of the operation. As she looked at the creature, she believed that the entity was able to read her thoughts and detect her worry about her necklace being dropped. Without hesitation, the leader then motioned to a small humanoid creature nearby to pick up the necklace. As the small creature picked up the necklace, however, the leader then told Jerry that she could not have it at the moment as the object had become contaminated after having fallen to the ground. Jerry watched as the smaller being placed the necklace into a plastic looking pouch and walked away with the object in hand. Sensing her worry about the necklace, the leader then reassured Jerry that the necklace would be returned to her after some time.

Now feeling calmed and reassured, Jerry relaxed as the leader then asked her quote "how the medication has been so far." Unsure of what the creature was asking, Jerry replied saying that everything had been fine so far. Immediately following her reply, the leader motioned to several other humanoid creatures, causing a large metallic needle like pring object to be forced through the back of Jerry's head, slightly above the neck, that caused such violent pain, that Jerry's body entered into rhythmic muscle spasms. According to Jerry, the pain had been worse than any sensation she had ever previously experienced, including childbirth. Within a few seconds, she would pass out from the pain and awaken in her room the following morning.

As she awoke, she remembered only brief moments of the event and recalled her necklace being taken from her. Hoping to find proof that the event was nothing more than a nightmare, Jerry began searching her jewellery box for the necklace but was unable to find it. Later, when asking her fiance about her necklace, he claimed to have remembered that she had fallen asleep with it on and that it must have fallen off during the night. After spending hours looking through the mattress and bed coverings, Jerry was unable to locate her necklace anywhere within her bedroom or her duplex apartment. It would not be for several months later that Jerry's mother would reportedly find the very same necklace inside a box hidden at the back of her closet.

The last alien abduction event that Jerry would be able to remember would be a less traumatic incident that would occur in 1991 and would be the catalyst for her diary and the source of the messages from extraterrestrial beings that led to the creation of her peculiar philosophy. Jerry claims that in the night, she had been taken by taller, much more human looking, fair skinned, blonde hair extraterrestrial humanoids to a massive vertical structure that she described as the largest building she had ever seen.

Being at the highest level of the structure, Jerry described that she was able to smell the spray of the sea and believed that she was somewhere near a beach or a seashore as she could hear the sounds of the wind and water breaking nearby. Surrounding her was equipment that appeared to have been illuminated and a number of the strange humanoid creatures that appeared to be watching her closely.

Once Jerry became comfortable, she claimed that the creatures started to show her a series of scenes telepathically of missiles and other rocket shaped weapons, though was unable to understand what was being communicated. She was then shown a sort of triangular machine that would become circular as it spun and had to do with flight in some way, though was uncertain. After Jerry would awake the next morning, she claimed to have been filled with information of a universal sort and felt that her mind had been turned up to full volume, flooded with thoughts and ideas. It would be over the course of the next several months that Jerry would write hundreds of poems, pages of philosophical rants, draw pictures of triangular shaped objects and write phrases beyond her own understanding.

Although this bizarre experience would be the very last encounter that Jerry would be able to recall with any clarity, as Jerry continued to investigate her impossible to explain experiences with extraterrestrial abduction, she started to uncover evidence that the abduction phenomenon had been affecting many other member's of her family. Not only did Jerry's younger brother and parents have possible experiences with alien abduction events, it appeared that all three of Jerry's children were suffering from abduction experiences of their own.

According to Jerry, from the time that her daughter Sally was only six years old, she had suffered from a series of severe night terrors that would cause her to wake up in the middle of the night and begin screaming "Don't touch me! Leave me alone!" causing the parents to hurriedly enter the room and find Sally sitting awake in her bed claiming to have seen an impossible to explain humanoid creature. Between the ages of nine and ten, Sally would often awake from these dreams suffering from unexplained and severe nosebleeds.

Curious as to Sally's nightmares, Jerry started asking Sally what it was that she was seeing in her dreams. Sally described seeing the night sky filled with unidentified flying objects and would go on to describe a dream of her seeing everyone in her family being taken out onto the deck of their home and seeing a spaceship arrive with a "lot of little creatures surrounding" her, asking her to come play with them. In one of Sally's dreams, she claimed to have seen what she described as a feminine humanoid figure with large eyes and an oval shaped bald head with a red bow seemingly stuck to her head as if it had been taped. This strange feminine figure would come to her bedroom window and ask her to come out and play. Feeling a sudden urge to go outside, Sally claimed that she had gone through the window and was then taken aboard a spaceship with the humanoid girl but was unable to remember anything further.

During one of Sally's night terrors, Jerry had awoken in the middle of the night to a strange sound she was unable to recognize. Worried that her daughter may have been suffering from her nightmares, she got up and went to her daughter's room to check up on her. As she entered her daughter's room, early in the morning, she noticed that Sally's nightgown had been twisted up and her underwear was missing. Panicked by the sight, Jerry went over to Sally and tried to wake her up. As Jerry continued trying to wake up Sally, it appeared to her as if Sally had been drugged as she was unable to stay awake and was unable to move her body. Sally would continue to have these experiences for the rest of her life and would, on several separate occasions, suffer from strange time loss events during the day that she would be unable to explain.

Additionally, Jerry's second oldest child, her son Matthew, would constantly complain about seeing terrifying puppets that he would refer to as Wo-Wo's from sesame street coming in through his bedroom window at night. According to Jerry, whenever the puppets from Sesame street were shown, Matthew would cry and scream and tell his parents to turn off the TV so that the puppets would not be able to come in through the screen. Matthew would also complain most about Bert from sesame street given his bizarre egg shaped head and "scary big eyes" that reminded him of the monsters from the window. When Matthew was around eight years old, he would tell his parents about a nightmare he had of a giant pyramid shaped flying saucer that talked to him and had large glowing eyes.

Curious as to her children's conditions, Jerry would eventually show her daughter Sally and her son Matthew pictures of extraterrestrial humanoids drawn by alien abduction witnesses. According to Jerry, her daughter Sally would gasp and cry as she would put her fingers in her mouth and her son Matthew would scream and ask if Sally saw the images too. Feeling that the reactions from her two kids were bordering on cruel suffering, Jerry would choose to not show the pictures to her third child, Colin, who Jerry believed suffered the most from his alien abductions experiences.

When Colin was only three years old, Jerry began extensively documenting what she believed were signs that Colin was being repeatedly abducted by extraterrestrial creatures. In her notes, Jerry would describe seeing Colin in one of her own personal abduction experiences, as if he had been abducted alongside her. When Colin was only three and a half years old, Jerry woke up in the middle of the night to the sound of Colin talking to himself in his crib. When she entered his room, she claimed to have found him sitting up in bed and seemed "very awake". On seeing his mother, Colin asked Jerry for some juice and then told her about lights outside the window and seeing owls with large eyes.

On the 29th of October, back in 1992, Colin would tell Jerry about seeing these owl like creatures and that whenever Colin was outside, he would look up into the sky and ask his parents aout he stars and the moon and mention the scary owls with large eyes that would fall down from the sky. One morning, after a terrible nightmare, Colin would complain about the owls from the stars saying that they would make him eat some food and attack him if they did not listen, oftentimes hurting his toe. Jerry would check Colin's toe and find that not only was there blood on his foot as if he had been cut, but his toenail had seemingly been ripped off the toe completely.

On the 25th of January, back in 1993, when Colin was only four years old, Jerry would describe an event in the bathroom that seemed akin to a panic attack that Colin was suffering from. According to Jerry, Colin suddenly stood on top of the toilet and started yelling "I don't want to go back to the spaceship" over and over again. Worried that he was suffering from some sort of mental illness, Jerry asked Colin why he's shouting and where he thinks he's currently at. As Jerry tried to ask Colin what was going on and made several attempts to calm him, Colin suddenly started crying and complaining that he often gets lost when he's in the spaceship and he doesn't like it. Once Colin calmed down, however, he started to explain that he believed that he was born on the spaceship and fell from the stars and that when he was on the spaceship, he remembers how dark it was.

When Jerry asked Colin how he got onto the spaceship if she gave birth to him, Colin said that the eyes took him there and brought him back down. When Jerry asked Colin what "the eyes" were, Colin replied saying that the eyes were king and that the king is God. For years following this event, Colin would complain of being taken aboard a spaceship and would refer to drawings of aliens as "Rocketeers" saying that he often sees them coming up and going back down.

When asked, Jerry was uncertain why it was that she and her family going back several generations were being abducted and experimented on by extraterrestrial life, but she theorised that perhaps certain families are chosen and followed for generations similar to how scientists will often study animals in the wild and follow their later descendants.

Catherine's Abduction Reports

A twenty two year old music student by the name of Catherine would end up reaching out to Harvard Professor of Psychiatry Dr. John E Mack for help, back around March of 19991, after admitting to the doctor that she was apparently suffering from events that seemed eerily similar to many of the strange alien abduction reports she had heard about from other alien abduction victims. Although the professor was initially hesitant to take on her case, he became extremely interested in her account after she described an event that had occurred to her only a few weeks prior to reaching out to him.

According to Catherine, she had been working late sometime in February when she finally finished her work and started driving home around the middle of the night. As she was driving home, however, she felt a sudden urge to avoid travelling back to her home located in Somerville, near Boston, and instead turned to drive out in a northern direction. As she started driving in this random direction, she felt the urge get stronger as she tried to wrestle with herself logically to start driving back home. After several minutes, she gave into the urge and continued in a northerly direction explaining to herself that it would be nice to go for a drive and put some highway miles onto her new car.

Oddly enough, while she was driving, she noticed that there had been a forty five minute chunk of time that was apparently missing, as she happened to glance between the time on the car radio and realised that almost an hour had passed even though she had driven less than a few hundred yards. Shortly after noticing this strange time loss event, Catherine decided that she should immediately head home and that driving out in the middle of the night was a completely ridiculous activity to be doing out in the middle of nowhere. She would return home at an unknown hour before the sun would rise.

The next day, Catherine would awake some time in the middle of the afternoon and would turn on the news to help wake her up. As she was watching the local news, a strange story came on about unidentified flying objects. Compelled to hear more, Catherine watched as the news commentators explained that an unexplainable object had been seen over Boston and was thought to have been a slow moving comet or meteor, though displayed peculiar behaviour. According to the news story, the unexplained light had been lazily moving across the sky before suddenly turning to travel horizontally in relation to the nearby treetops, as if skipping over the trees tops rather than falling down into them. Although the news commentators had a slight tongue in cheek attitude about the event, one of the eyewitnesses to the mysterious comment was a policeman and wife who had initially reported the comet and claimed that it had flown overhead, stopped motionless in the sky and shone a bright light down onto them.

Suddenly compelled by the weird story, Catherine started taking notes about the event and would chart out the object's path as it had been shown on the news. According to the local news, the object had followed a path from Southern Massachusetts all the way to the northeasternmost part of the state sometime around midnight to early in the morning. It was at this moment that Catherine came to the shocking conclusion that the object must have passed overhead as she had been driving in the night as the object's predicted path had crossed over the very same roads and highways she had been driving on in a northerly direction. In some strange coincidence, Catherine's drive had exactly mimicked the object's path.

Curious to explore more of Catherine's memories of the event, Dr. John Mack would schedule for a hypnosis regression session sometime in April of 1991. During their first session, despite repeated attempts made by Dr. Mack to bring out memories surrounding her time loss event on the night of her driving, Catherine would instead bring out memories of two separate abduction events that had occured when she was nine years old and another event that she believed occurred to her only a year prior back in 1990. According to Catherine, when she was only nine years old, she had awoken in the middle of the night to find that she was lying in some strange area completely terrified and unable to move an inch of her body. Unfamiliar with where she was, she glanced around and noticed some kind of creature that was standing behind her that had long fingers that were larger at the ends of the fingertips. As the creature approached closer, it laid its hands on her, feeling cold to the touch. Unfortunately, despite the hypnosis regression, Catherine was unable to remember anything further.

Shortly after this episode, Catherine would remember an event that she believed occurred sometime around Christmas back in 1990 when she had temporarily returned to her small home town in Alaska for the holidays. According to Catherine, while she was staying in her mother's home, she had gone to bed early but was awakened in the middle of the night and found herself in an area she had never seen before. She described the room as appearing to have been like a big fish tank, with curved walls surrounding her. Although she was uncertain of where she was, she believed that she had somehow been taken aboard a spaceship and was being observed by extraterrestrial creatures while in the strange room.

Shortly after this session, Catherine would choose to take several weeks before returning for future sessions as she felt that the experiences were too traumatizing to remember in their entirety. After these few weeks, however, Catherine felt a sudden urge to discover more after her mother, Susan, would open up to her about a UFO sighting that she had experienced during her years back in college prior to Catherine having been born. According to Susan, she had been with a group of about three dozen people outside in an isolated area when they saw a series of lights in the sky that demonstrated behaviors impossible for planes to have done. As they watched the lights, they would appear, vanish, move sporadically and hover as if they were watching the group of people.

Additionally, Catherine has always suspected that her younger brother had been the victim of a series of alien abductions, as he would often wake up with strange scars and marks that looked eerily similar to scars and marks that Catherine would remember receiving after her impossible to explain nightmares of being taken aboard an alien spaceship. Now believing that her family may have been chosen and targeted by extraterrestrial life, Catherine would return to Dr. John Mack and schedule five more hypnosis sessions for regression therapy.

Catherine would be able to recall one of her first ever reported alien abduction experiences that must have occurred sometime around when she was only three years old. According to her first regression session, Catherine claimed that she remembered waking up in the middle of the night and witnessing a humanoid creature standing at her bedroom window with a bright blue light emanating from behind the creature that would illuminate the inside of her bedroom. At the time of the experience, the home that Catherine was living in was a one story mobile home, meaning that the creature either had to have been incredibly tall or floating outside the window several feet above the ground. Catherine would describe the creature as having a pointed chin, huge black eyes, and his head looked like an inverted teardrop. For a mouth, the creature had a thin line stretching across its face and its nose appeared to have been nothing more than a small bump with nostrils much smaller than a human being's nostrils. The creature's skin tone was described as appearing to have had little to no color, as if it had been a gray or whitish color, backlit by the surrounding blue light.

All of a sudden, Catherine then said that a pillar of blue light had shone into the room, allowing the creature at the window to somehow materialize at the end of the blue light. As the strange humanoid creature entered the room, Catherine felt her body slowly float above her bed as she was being levitated out of the doorway of her bedroom and into the hallway. Terrified of what she was experiencing, Catherine attempted to scream but was unable to vocalize and remained completely paralyzed. As she was levitated into the main living room of the small home, Catherine described her perception of time appearing to speed up dramatically as she claimed to have seen five or six other strange humanoid beings moving around in the room at really fast and impossible speeds. Although she was unable to discern what exactly the creatures were doing, she believed that they were picking up objects around her house, looking at them and putting them back down until they observed every piece of furniture in her home.

After performing their high speed action for a few minutes, suddenly, the creatures stopped what they were doing and stood in a straight line as the bluish light washed over the living room. Without a sound or any movement, Catherine's body was then floated through the front door, face first, passing through the door as if nothing was there. Despite the encounter happening during the middle of the night, Catherine would remark that the entire outside appeared to have been lit up as if a massive light was floating above the house and illuminating the outside yard. As Catherine looked up towards the massive light, she would claim to see a large disc shaped ship covered with lights. Shortly after seeing the ship, Catherine would remember that she was levitated aboard the ship and brought into a large round room with a long bench that stretched around the perimeter of the room, broken up only by a small doorway estimated to have been maybe five feet in height.

According to Catherine, the room appeared to have been designed with human style in mind, as the bench had a long custom red cushion running along its entire length. Within the room, Catherine claimed to have seen other children around her age, roughly between five or six years, with all of them at least under ten years of age. As she and the children were standing around for a few minutes, a taller feminine alien being would enter the round room and ask the children if they wanted to play. Feeling both sleepy and confused, Catherine agrees with the feminine being, causing the creature to go to the other side of the room and bring back a small metallic ball that would float as the creature would wave around a small rod, matching the movements of the creature as it would levitate and rotate and move around in circles.

After playing with the rod, described as being roughly a foot long, an inch in diameter, with an antenna with a small ball at the end of it about four inches long and entirely silver gray in color, Catherine claimed that the creature would take the remote away from all of the children and point out which of the children did exceptionally well with the toy over others and claimed that they were very happy with how each of the children individually progressed as if they had been tested a few times before. The rest of the experience remained a hazy blur.

This would not be the only alien abduction event that Catherine would remember, however, as she would unlock through another five hypnosis sessions an event that several other friends of hers would remember, as well as have physical evidence for many years later, supporting her claims. According to Catherine, while she was staying the night at a friend's house with three of her friends, she had suddenly felt compelled to sneak away in the middle of the night and go down to a nearby alley to check out the house where a woman housed a flock of peacocks. During the middle of the sleep over, she successfully snuck outside and went down the alley while it was raining and muddy. Once she get to the neighbors house, she picked up a few small rocks and started throwing them at the birds hoping to see them open up and show her their feathers. As she did this, however, she noticed what she described as a little white man standing next to the fence with a big head, big eyes, and completely naked with no hair on its head or body.

Terrified of the strange creature, Catherine attempted to run away from the humanoid figure as it grabbed her by the arm and told her that he was going to take her somewhere. As she struggled against the creature, telling it that she was told by her parents not to go with people she doesn't know. Disregarding Catherine's desire to run away from the creature, the mysterious figure then began to fly upwards while holding onto Catherine, causing the ground to move away from them and the tops of the buildings to grow smaller as they continued levitating higher and higher into the air.

After only a few seconds of levitating through the air, Catherine claimed that she and the strange being appeared to have passed through a hole and ended up in the middle of a room. When asked to clarify what she means by a hole, Catherine is uncertain if they passed through a small doorway into a craft or a portal into a wormhole of some kind. Once in the room, Catherine attempted to hit the small creature, which she realized was about the same size as she was at the time, but when she went to attack the creature, she soon realized that for some unexplainable reason, she was completely paralyzed and unable to move.

The creature, however, would begin to communicate with Catherine telepathically, and was well aware of the fact that Catherine was hoping to attack the creature. Catherine would claim that the "little man" found it funny that she wanted to hit him and that she could almost hear him in her head laughing about the idea of being hit by the little girl. While telepathically communicating with Catherine, the creature would walk away from the girl and into a small nearby room to grab a large mysterious device before returning a few seconds later. Terrified of the device, Catherine would telepathically ask the creature what the device was for and why he was holding it. Sensing her thoughts and her panic, the creature telepathically responded that the device was going to be used to gather a sample from the girl for scientific research, remarking that they need a blood sample from the girl.

Believing that the aliens planned on cutting her open, Catherine would begin screaming and asking why they needed the sample, begging them not to go through with any of their plans. Before Catherine can make any further objections, however, the creature used the device which was described as looking similar to an eyedropper made entirely of metal and made a quick little incision against the fourth finger on her left hand as it drew out a small amount of blood. Feeling no pain, Catherine relaxed and then asked why the creatures were taking her blood, to which the small figure replied that they were interested in studying the planet in the hopes of stopping damage caused by pollution.

Shortly after this exchange, the creature would float Catherine back to the ground, allowing her to run back to the girl's home that she was having a sleepover at. Once Catherine entered the home, the other girls asked where she had been but she was unable to tell them what happened, feeling as if the memory of the incident was slowly disappearing from her mind. She then rationalized that she must have been standing outside in the rain for a breath of fresh air and returned after only fifteen minutes. To this day, Catherine has a small half moon shaped mark on her fourth finger of her left hand that she believes is a scar from this event.

Catherine believes that a few weeks following this abduction encounter, she would witness a group of unidentified flying objects flying near her mobile home with her mother as they were driving home one night. According to Catherine, as she and her mother, Susan, were on their way home, they witnessed what they described as little lights moving parallel to each other, close to the ground, hovering and maneuvering alongside a nearby hillside that rested several miles behind their mobile home. Unsure of what they were seeing, Susan would park the car at the side of the road and watch for a few minutes as the lights continued to move in strange ways that a plane would have been unable to naturally do. Described by the eyewitnesses, the lights appeared to dance and move around randomly over the hill and would occasionally swoop back down the hill in a parallel movement all together. After a few minutes of watching, Susan would pull up to the mobile home and go inside, letting Catherine watch the lights from her bedroom window. For reasons unknown, Susan would soon lose interest in the lights and head off to sleep while Catherine continued watching the lights. Oddly enough, Catherine's mother remembers the event but was convinced that the sighting had been nothing more than a strange dream.

After uncovering these bizarre memories and finding supporting evidence for their existence, including her mother's testimony, Catherine became convinced that she and her family were being experimented on and studied for some unknown purpose. Hoping to uncover the truth, Catherine would attend several more hypnosis sessions before unlocking one last alien abduction memory that she believed occurred to her sometime around Christmas of 1990 when she had been revisiting her mother's home after years of living within the city.

Referred to by Catherine as her first adult abductione experience, Catherine remembers returning to her mother's mobile home, located in a deserted area roughly six to eight miles away from a small town in south central Alaska, at the time. The event had occurred roughly two days following Christmas day, when she was walking through the hallway in the middle of the night and looked out the main window of the living room to see what she described as a "massive silvery disc" hovering above the ground in a large field that stretched for several acres behind her mother's home.

Catherine would later describe the unidentified flying object in more detail, claiming that the craft was resting on the ground between where the mobile home was and several large trees in the open field. The craft appeared to have been like a discus but with a much wider section in the middle. The entire craft was a silvery metal color and larger than the mobile home in width and height. Catherine would also claim to notice lights all around the circumference of the craft, all of which being white lights set inside a small groove. Upon seeing the craft, Catherine would describe the onset of a sudden panic attack as her anxiety continued to climb despite consciously being confused of what she was seeing.

Without much control, however, Catherine claimed that she suddenly started walking through the living room towards the front door as she put on a pair of heavy boots that belonged to her mother alongside her heavy coat as she walked outside despite fighting the urge to stay indoors. It appeared to Catherine that something outside of herself was controlling her urges and hypnotizing her to exit the home and walk towards the extraterrestrial vehicle, despite wearing nothing but a stretched out t-shirt, heavy boots and a warm coat in the middle of an Alaskan winter.

As Catherine continued walking through the pitch black darkness of the night, stepping over several feet of snow, a numbness that originated in her chest slowly started to expand to encompass the rest of her body. As she continued against her will, her entire body would go completely numb as if she had been injected with Novocain. Despite the numbness and growing feelings of paralysis, Catherine continued walking towards the light of the ship and noticed what she would describe as five tiny naked big headed creatures of the same size standing in a row and glowing a golden yellow as they all stood around the landed disc waiting for her to arrive.

Once close enough to the ship, the strange beings walked around Catherine and formed a semi circle around her as they reached out towards her with very long arms that were inhumanly disproportionate with the rest of their body. Catherine would describe the creatures in more detail as appearing to have no nipples, no belly buttons or navel of any king, no hair, or teeth and their faces were completely expressionless as if they were wearing a mask.

As she and the creatures were standing beside the craft, a metal ramp would descend from the middle of the craft that would rest at a sharp forty five degrees, causing the creatures to lead Catherine up into the craft as she seemed to glide up the ramp into an entry hallway that appeared to have had curved walls as she entered. Although there was no specific light source coming from anywhere, Catherine claimed that the entry hall appeared to have been illuminated by the walls that glowed a soft pleasing color. Once further down the hall, Catherine claimed to have seen an ovalish doorway that opened up into a large middle room with a platform at the center of the room and hundreds of panels with instruments and scientific devices lining the walls of the room. On the ceiling of the room, Catherine claimed to have seen what she described as a massive scientific looking apparatus that appeared to have been on an adjustable tentacle hinge similar to a desk lamp, allowing it to move around the room freely.

It was at this point that Catherine noticed another being and was telepathically informed that the creature was a kind of doctor or medical examiner expert. Surrounding the medical expert creature were dozens of different instruments and panels covered with buttons. In the middle of the room, beneath the large hinged contraption, Catherine describes a large solid block that appears to function as a table but has no open space beneath it. Without hesitation, Catherine's coat is floated away from her as she feels a sudden calmness wash over her entire body. Feeling calmed and relaxed, Catherine is then guided by the creatures towards the center block for her to lie down on top of. Before she can lie down on the block, however, the medical expert walks over to Catherine and looks over her, examining her in the same manner that someone would examine a specimen.

Unfortunately, the rest of the encounter remains a mystery to Catherine and no other abduction experiences have come to light since she began her hypnosis sessions. Catherine claims to vaguely recall seeing family members aboard the ship during one of her abductions, such as her brother and her mother Susan, along with strangers that she would be unable to recognize. To this day, Catherine believes that she and her family are at the center of extraterrestrial experimentation and investigation. Although she believes that the extraterrestrials told her the reasoning for their experimentation was to end world pollution, she maintains doubts as to the true reason behind her abduction experiences, believing instead that the actions were akin to a violating experience done against her will and the will of others for secret ulterior motives against the human race.

The Recovery Of Paige Wilson

On the 20th of August, back in 2010, a young girl of only eight years old would suddenly be reported missing while she had been camping with her grandparents and extended family out at the Washington Colville National Forest. Although she would be recovered at a later date, her statements surrounding her disappearance would only increase in their bizarre nature and leave many of the investigators scratching their heads in an attempt to offer an explanation.

According to the missing persons report, a young girl by the name of Paige Wilson had accompanied her cousins on a group trip, hosted by their grandparents, into a somewhat busy campground area located nineteen miles east of the city of Colville. Washington. Although the campgrounds was located somewhat deep in the wilderness, given the large number of visitors frequenting the location, the site was more than safe for the groups of kids, aged between eight to fourteen years old. At around noon, Paige and her cousins would travel throughout the campgrounds, chasing each other and having fun while their grandparents decided to spend their time barbecuing in the cooking area of the campground, alongside a group of other adults.

After roughly three hours, the grandparents started to round up the kids to enjoy a late lunch, only to notice that eight year old Paige Wilson was nowhere to be found. After spending about an hour searching for Paige Wilson throughout the campsite, as well as getting help from other campers staying in the nearby area, the grandparents and cousins were unable to locate where the eight year old girl had wandered off to. At around 4:00 P.M. The local law enforcement would be contacted and an official search for Paige Wilson would be started within the hour.

According to the official national park report, National Forest officials were immediately notified and were given support from search and rescue volunteers from the nearby Fairchild United States Air Force Base to serve as air support in the search efforts for Paige Wilson. Within two hours the Spokane County Sheriff's office, four other adjoining counties and a team of volunteers joined in on the search and were on the ground and in the area by around 6:00 P.M. forming a grid like pattern in a radius surrounding the outskirts of the campgrounds. After several more hours of unsuccessful searching, a team of Bloodhounds were brought in from several different jurisdictions and were led to the site of the disappearance and where Paige Wilson had last been seen. Even after being given several sources of the girl's scent, the dogs were unable to locate any trace of the missing girl leaving the campgrounds area. After another six hours of searching, the bloodhounds were then brought out into random areas surrounding the campground but were still unable to find any evidence of the missing girl or her scent.

Initially investigators were confused as to why the bloodhounds were unable to pick up Paige Wilson's scent, but dismissed the peculiar behaviour as being caused by the many different conflicting smells of the campgrounds. The bloodhound teams, however, claimed that conflicting smells should not have disturbed the dogs as much as they were experiencing and believed that the animals must have been stressed or confused in some way, leading to their bizarre behaviour. The search for Paige Wilson would continue without stop until late into the night, though search efforts were soon made complicated by a sudden turn in the weather. According to official weather services, by ten o clock that night, temperatures would plunge to below freezing and plummet further as the night dragged on. Investigators started to worry that Paige Wilson would be unable to stay warm given the limited clothing she had been wearing at the time of her disappearance.

After the first thirty six hours following Paige Wilson's disappearance, search and rescue volunteers switched their focus from calling to the girl, hoping for her to respond within earshot, to now looking for a body possibly laying on the floor of the wilderness. Fearing that the plummeting temperatures may have been too much for Paige Wilson, investigators maintained a grid-like search pattern with many of the search and rescue volunteers walking hand in hand to be certain that they would not miss the body of the little girl. It would not be another forty eight hours since her disappearance that Paige Wilson would finally be recovered after a series of bizarre circumstances.

According to the search and rescue investigators, two days following Paige Wilson's disappearance, on the morning of Sunday August 22nd at around eight o'clock in the morning, Paige Wilson was found while walking alongside a gravel road more than four miles away from where she had last been seen. She would be discovered by a search and rescue volunteer who had been passing through the region and noticed Paige Wilson walking in the direction away from the campgrounds, seemingly in a confused and disoriented state. According to the investigators, Paige had been covered in mild scratches and bruises that covered her arms but otherwise appeared to have been in perfect condition despite having spent more than twenty hours in below freezing temperatures wearing only a t-shirt and pants.

Fearing that Paige Wilson could have been the victim of an attempted kidnapping, given the bizarre circumstances of her disappearance, Search and rescue investigators would interview the young eight year old girl, asking her exactly what caused her disappearance. Her story, which would later be featured on the website of the local KXLY news media television station on the 12th of September, would claim that Paige had suddenly found herself standing in the middle of the wilderness with no possible explanation. Paige would explain that she had been walking through the campsite when she suddenly awoke in a confused state and realised she was lost in the middle of the forest. Though some have theorized that Paige Wilson could have suffered from a possible seizure, detectives worried that Paige could have been drugged or have been covering up details surrounding her disappearance out of fear.

Hoping to gather more information, Paige's parents would question the eight year old girl about what would happen, but found that she became increasingly disturbed when trying to remember the cause of her disappearance. By the 24th of August, investigations surrounding Paige's disappearance and recovery were all but finished, with the parents providing a statement to a local television station by the name of KTVB claiming that Paige has stayed silent on her ordeal and refuses to talk about her experience anymore to anybody.
